Mr. WEBB. For and against the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. That does not include the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to get in on this somewhere, and I want to be included on one side or the other.

Mr. GORDON. I am for the amendment, and I would like 10 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest we let the debate run a little.

Mr. WEBB. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on these two amendments be closed in 20 minutes on a side, 20 minutes for those in favor of the amendment and 20 minutes for those opposed to it.

Mr. GORDON. I object to that. Fifteen minutes has been used up in favor of the amendment and five against it so far.

Mr. WEBB. As suggested by my friend from Wisconsin, I make the request of 30 minutes on a side, 30 minutes for those in favor of the amendment and 30 minutes for those opposed. That is an hour.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, who would control that time, so that I may know whether I get in or not?

Mr. WEBB. I hope the committee will agree to that length of time. It is very generous, it seems to me, and will give everybody who wants an opportunity to make a five-minute talk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the debate on the Walsh amendment and the Stevenson amendment be limited to one hour, one-half of the time to be granted to those in favor of the amendments and one-half to those opposed.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman give me 10 minutes of that time? You have had 15 minutes against this amendment and only 5 for it.

Mr. WEBB. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman five minutes, and if the other side——

Mr. GORDON. That is satisfactory. Will the other side give me five?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to know if I can get in on that time?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER. I object if I can not get some response to my question.

Mr. WEBB. I do not know to whom he has addressed it.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I have three times now reserved the right to object, and have asked the gentleman through the Chair if I could get some time of that 30 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. So far as I am concerned, I will be happy to have the gentleman get five minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. I wanted 10 minutes. Can I get five from the other side?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I think I can give the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER. I may not want it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina just how broad his request is?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. Is it on the amendment?

Mr. WEBB. It is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. CANNON. And that is as far as the request goes?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just one word on these amendments. I am very much in hope that the committee will not adopt either one of them. I come from a section of the country where the judges will get a smaller salary than they will get under the bill in New York City. I do not share in the prejudices which some gentlemen seem to exhibit here between judges who live in rural sections and those who live in populous sections like Pittsburgh, New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago. I know from my experience in living in Washington, and being in New York and other big cities, that it costs a man more to be a judge in New York City, Philadelphia, Chicago, and Pittsburgh than it does to be a judge in North Carolina, and I can not see any sense in the prejudice attempted to be aroused between the judges in the various sections of the country. For a hundred years, as has been stated, Congress recognized that very thing. Up to 1893 there was never an equality of salaries of the Federal judges. Take South Carolina, the State that the gentleman [Mr. STEVENSON] hails from, and I wish to say that John C. Calhoun was jealous of the rights of South Carolina, and yet when he was in the United States Senate they paid the judges down there $2,750 a year and paid them $3,750 in New York City. It costs more to live in the large cities. The fees of the lawyers are bigger in the big cities. The salary of a judge in South Carolina amounts to more than the salary of a judge in New York City. I have always contended that these judges ought to be paid graded salaries.

Mr. ASWELL. Did the gentleman ever know the judge to go back to the practice of law?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; Members of Congress do not often go back either, voluntarily.

The time has come when we must pay our judiciary a salary which is commensurate with the dignity of the office and the duty they perform and the cost to them of their performance of duty. Otherwise we will lose some of the best men we have on the bench. We pay our United States judges less in New York City than the State judges of New York, 52 of them, are paid. Those State judges get $17,500 for the work they do as State judges, while we expect to get the best talent in New York City for Federal judge for $6,000 a year.

Therefore this graded scale which we have so carefully worked out and which has met the approval, as has been stated, of the judges of the United States, not because the salaries were increased but because it meets with their sense of justice and because they realize it costs less to live in some parts of the country than in others.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks of the point made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] that in case the southern district of New York happened to be divided some of the judges would be drawing $10,000 salary for just a few population? What would the gentleman think of that?

Mr. WEBB. My judgment is that the southern district of New York will never be divided. It is too compact. We would have more judges instead of dividing the district.

Mr. DENISON. It will be conceded it might be done?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think it would be done.

Mr. RUCKER. If you have another judge, you give two judges the salary you give one now.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I also yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GORDON. Now, Mr. Chairman, about all the time that has been consumed up to date has been against this amendment.

I am in favor of the amendment supplemented by the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]. A great many erroneous things have been said about this proposition. In the first place, they are calling all the Federal judges in as witnesses to the fact that they are in favor of raising their salaries. That is a very remarkable situation. Have you anybody as witnesses that have not a self-interest in this question whom you can call? This question ought to be determined not by the testimony of interested witnesses but upon the question of the public interest.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GORDON. No; I will not. I want to say something myself. [Laughter.]

Now, we have had our attention called to the fact that the collectors of customs are paid fees in accordance with the amount of their collections. We have had that cited as a precedent for fixing the salaries of judges according to the amount of business done. Of course, that has no application whatever. Men who collect money on a percentage basis receive more compensation the more money they collect. There is no question about that, but that has no relation to Federal judges. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] seems to think that the lowest salary fixed in this bill is about the measure of what the lawyers in his district are entitled to. [Laughter.] Well, I am not specially acquainted with the bar of North Carolina, but I have no doubt they have able lawyers in North Carolina as well as in New York. There is no sense in fixing salaries upon a scale like that. The duties of Federal judges are fixed by law. They are exactly and precisely the same in every district in the United States, and you can not defend successfully the proposition of giving a graded salary to them, dependent upon their place of residence.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] called attention to exactly what will happen here if they ever divide one of these districts. The Constitution prohibits the decrease of a salary of a judge during his incumbency, and if you divide a district and reduce the population in consequence, there you are. There is nothing in the argument that the value of the service rendered is in proportion to the population. If the business of a court is more than a judge can attend to the statute provides for sending additional judges into that district to clean up the docket, and that is what has been done. In 1891 Congress had sense enough to see the absurdity of fixing the salary of a Federal judge in one district at a different figure from what it was in other districts. It thereupon amended the statute making the salaries uniform, and it provided for the transfer of judges from one district to another in order to dispose of business pending upon the docket. That answers every possible reason that can be advanced, and this is going back to a bad precedent.

Reference has been made to the fact that in Ohio and Pennsylvania they have enacted legislation discriminating in favor of the cities as against the rural districts in reference to salaries and compensation of public officials. Well, of course, they have done that because the large city delegations got together and "put it across." That is all there is to it. [Laughter.] You need not tell me that there is any substantial, sensible reason for discriminating in the salaries of judges, because there is not, and there has been no intelligent reason given here up to date. I think the salaries of Federal judges ought to be fixed at about $7,500 a year, and it ought to be made general.

Mr. STEVENSON. The same as the salary of Congressmen?

Mr. GORDON. Yes. You might just as well say that some Member of Congress who represents a rural district here ought not to be paid as much as the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], because he comes from the city of Philadelphia. There is absolutely no more sense or logic in fixing the salaries of your judges on the basis of the place of their residence than there is for fixing the salaries of your Congressmen since the amendment of the statute providing for the transfer of judges so as to dispose of the business pending before them; none whatever. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], as amended by the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], fixing the salaries at the uniform rate of $7,500, will be adopted. It ought to be.

Now, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] calls attention to the fact that the salaries of assistant treasurers of the United States occupying the positions of heads of Subtreasuries under the law that we have tried repeatedly to repeal—and which ought to be repealed, because their service no longer amounts to anything—he calls attention to the fact that their salaries were based upon the business that the Subtreasuries transacted, and he insists that that should be used as a precedent for fixing the salaries of Federal judges. Of course, there is no analogy between the duties of a Federal judge and the duties of a collector of public money or a subtreasurer.

Mr. DENISON. On the theory of this bill, what salary in the gentleman's opinion should a Senator receive as compared with a Member of the House?

Mr. GORDON. Well, a Senator from the State of New York perhaps ought to receive $25,000, while a Senator from the State of Nevada might receive $3,000. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Right in line with the gentleman's own suggestion, if a judge had his residence in a rural district and was not given much business and went to help out a judge in New York, say, he ought to have a raise in pay, or some increase of compensation, while he is working in New York?

Mr. GORDON. Of course.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I know; but that would be absurd.

Mr. GORDON. Yes. Gentlemen, I hope the House will consider this legislation carefully. Many Members do not agree with me in the opinion that there ought to be any raise at all, but I would gladly vote for a general increase to $7,500 a year for these judges. But on careful consideration I do not think that the Members of this House can justify themselves in discriminating between the salaries of judges in one place and another. That thing was tolerated for a hundred years in this country, and finally, when the enormity of it began to be apparent, it was abolished, and very properly abolished. It was then provided that in those districts where there was not much business and in other districts where the business was congested a transfer of judges might be made. That is the law now, and that answers every possible argument as to discriminating between the salaries of these incumbents in these offices. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio yields back two minutes.

Mr. WALSH. To which side?

The CHAIRMAN. One minute to each side.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I protest against the policy of paying unequal salaries to the judiciary of this country. If that policy is ever adopted it will be found so unsatisfactory that you will have to raise all the salaries to the top limit. There is no justification whatsoever for paying the district judge in Chicago, Judge Landis, $9,500 and paying the district judge in my home city, Judge Ferdinand Geiger, $7,500, when the cost of living in their respective home cities is about the same, and especially when Judge Geiger is a member of the same circuit court of appeals and sits beside Judge Landis, as he frequently does. It would be an inequality and an injustice to have one of those judges receiving $9,500 and the other receiving but $7,500. There is no reason why you should pay the judge in Minnesota $9,000 just because that State is all in one district and pay the judges in Wisconsin $7,500 because Wisconsin is divided into two districts.

There are many inequalities that will come to plague this Congress if you once adopt this arbitrary policy. It will be a premium against the division of districts. It will result in the districts remaining as they are, say, for instance, in Indiana, where under the present bill the district judge is to receive a salary of $9,000. Instead of dividing the district into territorial units so as to give a better administration of justice, it will be the policy to add district judges there, so that they can receive the maximum salary.

It has been stated that the system proposed in this bill is in line with the fixing of the salaries of postmasters. I say the fixing of the salaries of postmasters at the even grade of $6,000 is the policy that should be adopted in this bill, of fixing uniform salaries of the judges. We should fix the salaries of district judges throughout the country uniformly so as to obtain the same character of ability.

In these large cities—in Philadelphia, in Pittsburgh, and in New York—there are a greater number of men who are able and willing to accept this uniform salary, and they should not have accorded to them a salary which is so much higher than in the neighboring States. The gentleman from New York refers to what he calls the $10-a-day increase. I deny that it is an increase. The statute is absolutely clear that when district judges are away from their homes sitting as members of the Circuit Court of Appeals its judges are allowed $10 a day for actual expenses. Is it contended that these judges receive an increase of compensation for having their living expenses when they are away from home paid back to them at a sum not exceeding $10 a day? They get that when they go away from their homes in their individual districts. It is not considered as increased compensation. I will not cast the slur upon the judiciary of this country that when they go from their homes they make returns of anything else than their actual living expenses, for which the statute prescribes. The testimony shows that these judges only return their actual hotel expenses when they are serving as members of the Circuit Court of Appeals.

Mr. RUCKER. They always return $10 a day, do they not?

Mr. STAFFORD. They do not. There are many who do not, and the testimony shows that they do not.

Mr. RUCKER. I never heard of one who did not.

Mr. STAFFORD. We had this whole question up in the House some years ago, when the judicial code was under consideration, and the statute is absolute, saying that they are to be allowed their actual living expenses, not to exceed $10 a day.

Now, I protest that the population is no criterion whatsoever as to the amount of work that a district judge does or of the character of the work that he does. In these times a district judge down in Arizona may have the same responsible litigation before him that a district judge in New York or Philadelphia may have, and we should have the same character of ability in Arizona as we have in New York or in Pennsylvania.

Mr. REAVIS. I am a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary that has jurisdiction and control over the question of the increase of the number of Federal judges. It happens that a small State has made application before that committee for an additional judge, because the work is more than the present judge can do.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman confirms what I am saying. It is not the population that ought to determine, because the country over instances are numerous where these district judges are burdened. It is not the character of the work, because we must assume that all these district judges have on occasion the same character of work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I was promised five minutes by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. Will some gentleman representing him accord me a few minutes?

Mr. STEELE. How many minutes would the gentleman like?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think I can conclude in three minutes.

Mr. STEELE. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes additional.

Mr. STAFFORD. The only question in determining what our policy should be is to fix the salary at a figure that will attract the character of men who will be able to administer the high duties of a district judge, and that salary should be the same throughout the country. There are high-priced corporation attorneys in every district of this country—in Arizona, in the arid West. There are men in New York City who have such financial returns that the honor of the district bench will not attract them, but the salary should be such—$7,500, in my opinion—that no man with honorable motives should be deterred from seeking the bench and continuing there without any outside support.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman a while ago referred to the $10 a day as being actual reimbursement for actual expenses. I think the House should have the benefit of the statute. Will the gentleman object to reading that portion of the statute for the benefit of the House—section 259?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to read as to the traveling expenses. I have not here my notations of the code——

Mr. STEELE. That is the provision of the code.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know the gentleman is a member of the Judiciary Committee, but the gentleman is not calling to the attention of the House the language incorporated in the sundry civil appropriation act, which limits this $10 a day to actual expenses.

Mr. STEELE. The Judicial Code does that likewise.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will read it:

SEC. 259. The circuit justices—

That is, the members of the Supreme Court assigned to these respective circuits—

the circuit and district judges of the United States, and the judges of the district courts of the United States in Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, shall each be allowed and paid his necessary expenses of travel, and his reasonable expenses (not to exceed $10 per day) actually incurred for maintenance, consequent upon his attending court or transacting other official business in pursuance of law at any place other than his official place of residence, said expenses to be paid by the marshal of the district in which such court is held or official business transacted, upon the written certificate of the justice or judge.

And that has been also strengthened by a provision in the sundry civil appropriation act, which restricts the expenditure of this money to the actual expenses of the judge.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are so many inequalities that will arise if the plan suggested by the committee is adopted. Think of it, in the circuit court of appeals Judge Landis draws $9,500, where living expenses are no greater than they are in Milwaukee, and another beside him receives $7,500. Are you in favor of those inequalities—the inequality of allowing a district judge in New York City, Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh just because of an arithmetical computation, not because of the character of the litigation, not because of the amount of work, because the district judges in outside communities have just as much work as judges in the large metropolitan centers. I appeal to you to vote down this archaic, arbitrary policy of 10 years ago, when it was found not a proper basis in fixing the salary of the judges of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. RUCKER.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I also yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. RUCKER.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, as I understand the proposition the bill under consideration proposes to increase the salaries of Federal judges by amounts ranging from $500 to $4,000, depending on population and the amount of business, one or both. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] seeks to amend by making the salary of the judges uniform, fixing it at $8,000. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] seeks to amend that amendment by reducing the amount to $7,500.

I am opposed to the bill and to both of the pending amendments. Much of the argument here is based on the fact that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary. Of course the report is unanimous, because we learn from each member of the Judiciary Committee who has spoken in support of the bill that the testimony was all one way, and they, sitting as a jury, were bound to find in accordance with the preponderance of evidence, and the evidence, it appears, was all one way. All of the district judges of the country, it seems, and representatives from State and national bar associations, probably interested in lawsuits pending in those courts, and who perhaps did not want to incur the displeasure of the circuit judge or the district judge, appeared before the committee and advocated this legislation. The testimony was all one way, and, of course, the committee returned a verdict in accordance therewith.

I am not influenced either by the testimony adduced, the argument made, or by fear of any result to me by reason of my attitude. An argument is made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] that the committee was warned that if Congress fails to obey the order which has been issued by these distinguished gentlemen, the children of fortune, more blest than any other class of people in America, that they, the Federal judges, will resign from the judicial positions they hold. Well, let me reply to him that when one of them resigns, in my judgment, there will be a ratification meeting in the community in which he lives if not all over his district. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would that apply to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, the gentleman from New York is a high flier and I am too timid to go up with him. He will excuse me. [Laughter.] They say that in congested districts the judges have so much expense to bear that they ought to have this raise of salary. My Lord, I never heard it said that living expenses are any higher any place than they are in Washington to-day.

I stated in a colloquy this morning, and I repeat, the office of Federal judge approaches autocracy more nearly than ought to be tolerated in a free country if that country hopes to continue to be free. A district judge does not begin his court until he pleases; he convenes his court at his own sweet will, at about 10 or 11 o'clock in the morning; works up to about 12, takes a recess for lunch of two hours or two hours and a half; works again until about 4, and then you could plead with him, as I have seen done, to save a citizen from bankruptcy by hearing a motion or a witness which would not require more than five minutes, and he would refuse and in an arbitrary spirit adjourn his court until 10 o'clock the next morning regardless of the great financial loss to those who were dragged into his court, in most instances against their will. I know what I am talking about, and gentlemen who hear me know that what I say is true.

In the State courts, where the judges are elected by the people, when the hour of adjournment arrives, if the lawyer informs the court, "We have a dozen witnesses here on expense, and can not you hear them to-night?" he will do so and thereby avoid much anxiety, expense, and disappointment.

I will tell you what ought to be done; instead of raising the salary, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] says, in order to keep Federal judges in the service we ought, if we will lay aside sentiment and cowardice, to amend the Constitution of the United States and provide that these judges who deal with the liberties and property rights of their fellow citizens shall be elected for a stated term by the voters of the country. [Applause.] Elect these judges by the people and then they will convene court at 8 or 9 o'clock in the morning, do a reasonable amount of work each day, and stop that abominable city practice of taking two hours for lunch, a custom which has spread until it has permeated every bureau of the Government in the Nation to-day. Go down to the departments now to transact business and you may find the stenographer, but you can go from room to room only to be told that the high-up officials are at lunch. They take lunch from 11 o'clock to 3 [laughter], and under such conditions there is no wonder prices are high and the pay roll of Government clerks is staggering. [Laughter.]

What we ought to do instead of raising salaries is to amend the Constitution and provide, as I said—and I repeat it—that every one of these judges shall be elected by the people and have somebody to whom he is responsible for his conduct.

Now, why raise these salaries? Oh, gentlemen, it is nice to obey the will and do the bidding of the officeholder, but I beg of you to pause and consider for a moment your duty to the already overburdened people of America, people who in the last three years, on account of the great issues involved, have willingly and patriotically submitted to a burden of taxation the like of which no country on earth, at least this country, ever witnessed before.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I have not the time. The people whom we serve are now burdened with taxation; and all over the country hundreds of thousands of loyal people—men and women—who are engaged in what they are pleased to call "war work," are pleading with us, begging of us, to give them an increase of salary; thousands are to-day begging of this Congress to give them money enough with which to return to their homes, if their services can not longer be utilized. If we grant this class of people relief we will only give them a pittance. But when it comes to this aristocratic, arrogant class—the Federal judges—I speak advisedly, and will not apologize to any district or circuit judge for my language—when we come to deal with them, gentlemen here contend that $500 increase must be allowed to judges in the rural districts, but that in the congested districts we must give the judge an increase of $4,000—more by way of increase to a salary already quite high enough than 90 per cent of the men who are performing patriotic and valiant services for the country earn in a year. I say to you that if you will brace up, if you will gird your loins and be true to yourselves and true to the great body of the people of this Nation, true to the patriotic people who are patiently suffering the enormous burdens which conditions compelled us to place upon them, you will make answer to the committee that reported this unjust and indefensible bill, that while its report is justified, because the evidence is all one way, we have considered the bill in the light of present-day conditions, and we send it back with the suggestion that if these circuit judges or district judges do not want to serve, for God's sake let them resign, and the quicker the better. Gentlemen talk about the amount of work they do. That is the curse of it. The district judge who is most popular is the one who has the least to do, as a rule. Gentlemen of the House, I know I stand alone; I know I have no support here in the views I express. I am not dull enough to indulge the hope that my appeal to this House will convert any man's judgment, but though I stand alone, though I cast the only vote, I am resolved and determined that I will never yield to a great officeholding class to put additional burdens upon the people of my district and yours—burdens which I do not believe they ought to be required to bear.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the principal complaint here seems to be that the lawyers of the great cities—which are not very numerous—can make more money off the bench than they can on. I regard that as unimportant. All of the great men, or at least most of the great men of this country, have been compelled to choose between the accumulation of wealth and the acquirement of honor and renown through the gratitude and applause of their fellow men. If the lawyers in the great cities would rather make money than achieve distinction on the bench, that is their affair; but that is no reason why the people of some other State should pay taxes in order to bestow on them greater salaries than they give their own judges for the same work; and that is the long and short of this whole discussion. As a matter of fact, practically all the great judges of the American bench came from the smaller towns. It would be difficult to enumerate any serious list of learned and distinguished jurists on the bench who did not, and if the attorneys in the big cities want to grow rich instead of going on the bench, this country can do what it has always done before, go to the smaller towns and country communities and get its great judges. There is no reason why your people or my people should increase their taxes in this way to meet such an alleged emergency.

One feature of this, of course, is the difficulty lawyers have in discussing the question of the salary of the man before whom they must make their living. They seem to think it is contempt of court for taxpayers to discuss the necessity of increasing a judge's salary. There is an ancient axiom that the ruling passion is strong in death and every great emergency. In one of Kipling's stories he tells us of an English derelict, a wreck of manhood, in India, who was rescued from some opium den and brought to a suitable hospital and afforded every advantage that modern science could give. He did not recover. As he lay there, surrounded by the best of surgeons and the kindest of nurses, his poor, distorted, dwarfed, and ruined mind groped only in the past, and as his pitiful soul winged its way from its earthly surroundings he muttered, "Not guilty, your honor."

Yesterday on this floor I heard something which reminded me of that tale, and which perhaps explained why the judges of New York City receive such ample salaries as we were told of. The gentleman from New York City [Mr. DONOVAN] who followed me on the floor said: "The question is, Is $6,000 enough for a district judge and is $7,000 enough for a circuit judge? I plead not guilty, and hope you, the jury, will bring in a verdict to pass the bill." A judge is mentioned, and Tammany Hall pleads not guilty.

There is no charge here against the gentleman from Tammany or those he represents, as there was none against the Englishman. Yet, as the Englishman left this mortal plane there lingered only in his memory the recollection of his crimes. As the gentleman from Tammany Hall takes the floor here for almost the first time, it is perhaps the instinct of Tammany Hall that forces him to say to us when a judge is mentioned, "I plead not guilty."

"Not guilty, your honor. I am in favor of paying $11,000 or $17,000 to a judge." It is only some western revolutionary who would have the audacity to challenge the demands of a tribunal before which he may some time be summoned. Tammany Hall may have big salaries for little judges before whom she appears at the bar of justice to plead for her clients or members, perhaps expecting reciprocity—and getting it—but that is no reason why the people where I live should be afraid of the dispensers of justice.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is reflecting upon the New York bench, and I resent that.

Mr. LITTLE. I request that order be maintained. When the gentleman from New York City discussed me yesterday he refused to yield to a question and did not print in his speech the remark I made.

Kansas asks no favor from any judge or any tribunal. All we ask is justice, and justice we have been able to get so far pretty well, and intend to have hereafter, whatever salaries are paid.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. No, I do not. I asked for order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is reflecting upon the Members of this House.

Mr. LITTLE. Not as much as the gentleman is by disturbing the ceremonies here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. May I ask three minutes more, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. STEELE. My time is already taken up.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes in which to finish.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I will after the three minutes are up, if I have finished.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Surely you will let me reply——

Mr. LITTLE. You can reply. The gentleman from your city yesterday did not let me interrupt him and I did not cry for help. All Kansas wants is a fair fight. All men look alike to us in Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time may be extended for three minutes, and that he may have those three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. If the men who plead "not guilty" fixed the salaries of the judges in New York City, I am not surprised they run up to $17,500. Of course, gentlemen of the committee, it is somewhat difficult for a lawyer to oppose a raise in salary of the men before whom he makes his living. But that is not the question here. The only question is whether we want to raise men's salaries from $6,000 to $8,000 or from $6,000 to $10,000. Has anybody in this House demanded that his salary be raised from $7,500, and yet you know that every man in this House is put to an expense beyond that of any judge in his community, by reason of the extra expense here and the various demands upon him. You know it is impossible for a man to save anything here upon the salary he gets at this time if he has the average district of from 40,000 to 60,000 voters. If some great society appoints a man here, if he comes from a district in which only 4,000 or 5,000 vote, he may escape the responsibilities of those who represent the live wires that do America's thinking. I am in favor of raising the salaries of these judges before some of whom I practiced for 30 years to such salary as we receive, and I would vote for that, but if a man comes here and shakes his fist in my face and tells me I can not challenge the demand of any tribunal that happens to want us to pay over the money of the taxpayer, I demand his authority to dictate to the Representatives of the American people what shall be done with the people's money. You and your committee have heard everything these judges had to say, and it is proper you should. But what have you heard from the taxpayers who are to pay this money? You do not come here as attorneys who practice before a bench; you come here, gentlemen, as the direct representatives of the taxpayers of this country and——

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. And it is for them you should be thinking. It is the taxpayers whom you represent, not the judges, gentlemen. If you give them as much as you get, that is as much as generosity will suggest or justice should allow. I believe the gentleman here from New York wants to ask me a question. Go to it!

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is very kind of the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLE. It is better than your colleague did for me yesterday.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the gentleman any information as to the bench of New York, how it is made up? He made his statement as to Tammany judges, and I want to say that the judges on the bench of New York, candidates of Tammany, are some of the ablest jurists in the country. The gentleman has made a statement, and he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman suggests I do not know what I am talking about when I speak of the courts of New York; perhaps——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have lawyers practicing there——

Mr. LITTLE. He says they have lawyers practicing there. There were kings before Agamemnon and there are lawyers who do not live in New York City. John Marshall was one of them. The gentleman wants to know if I know what I am talking about. I once spent several hours sitting on the bench in New York—curiously observing McIntyre try a case—by the side of James A. Blanchard, of the supreme court, at his courteous request. I happen to know he had been a candidate for a position on the Federal bench at a salary of $6,000, and he was soon after elected judge of the Supreme Court of New York at a salary of $17,500, so I guess they did not get any better man at $17,500 than we can put upon the Federal bench of New York City for $6,000. Justice Blanchard was a learned and distinguished jurist who valued his work above his salary. Every lawyer in this country is more or less familiar with the bar of the metropolis. The country knows more about New York City than the city does about the country, evidently.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Is there any other question anybody wants to ask? I believe the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL]——

Mr. SIEGEL. The gentleman is charming, and would he answer a question——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SIEGEL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kansas be extended for one minute, not to be taken out of the time allotted. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIEGEL. I would like to ask the gentleman how it is he mentions the name of a justice who is dead instead of giving us a live one?

Mr. LITTLE. I do not happen to be personally familiar with any of the recent judges. My time is limited. Besides, when I begin to divulge my store of information some New Yorker objects. Are there any other questions?

Mr. REED. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. REED. Why should not we raise the salary of the other arm of the Federal court, the farmer who goes and serves as juryman for a month and receives, I think, $3 a day, and has to pay for his living in the city?

Mr. LITTLE. That is a pertinent question. I expect the $3 man hardly had the means to present his claim. I suppose they would want the salaries of the jurors in the cities raised, however. No, gentlemen, this country must hold out the same prize to one lawyer in one place as it does to another in another place, and that is all there is to that. The greatest judges we have had have come from the country, and if we should have to return to that practice no harm will be done to the jurisprudence of this great Republic. David J. Brewer, of Leavenworth, never practiced law in a town of more than 5,000 people. He never held court in a city of 20,000 till the President honored the Federal bench by his appointment. Possibly in the annals of a hundred years New York City can cite from her lengthy list of jurists one instance of learning as ample, scholarship as thorough, diction as polished, character as stable, judgment as sound, and a legal mind as gifted as that of David Brewer, of Kansas.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE], a member of the committee.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee I feel that I ought to say a word upon this proposition. I am against the amendment and favor the provisions in the bill because I think that those provisions are fair and just. I have not any fault to find with any other man's opinion, but what the committee has striven to do is to base the compensation of Federal judges upon the work that is required of them in the different localities, and there is nothing new in this practice. Now, we are entirely accustomed to it to-day in the State of New York. There we have a number of justices of the supreme court, and justices of the supreme court in Greater New York severally receive an annual salary of $17,500 a year. I do not hold any brief for Tammany Hall, but Tammany Hall does not fix that salary. The salary of a justice of the supreme court up the State is $10,000 a year, and all the salaries are fixed by the State. Nobody in the State has ever complained so far as I know in reference to this difference in salary.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. Yes; if the gentleman will get me some additional time.

Mr. GORDON. I will ask unanimous consent for it.

Mr. MAGEE. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman base that discrimination against other State judges on the ground of the high cost of living in New York or on the cost of high living in New York?

Mr. MAGEE. It is generally regarded as based upon the greater cost of living in the city of New York. It costs more to live there. It is also based upon the further fact that by reason of the large population the duties required of a judge are greater. And nobody complains.

Mr. GORDON. That does not apply in the Federal court, where they can send outside judges in to help out with the work?

Mr. MAGEE. They send outside justices into the city of New York to help the justices there.

The point I make is that there is nothing new in the application of the principle involved in this bill, and that the principle involved has been in operation in the State of New York for some years and nobody complains. Now, for instance, gentlemen—and the only purpose of every Member of the House, I assume, is to be fair and just to these Federal judges—what we want is a high standard of the judiciary, and it seems to me that we owe it to ourselves and to the country to pay our Federal judges such salary as will draw to the bench all over the country the best legal talent procurable.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What would the gentleman say to a condition such as this, where a single judge represents an entire State, and might under the provisions of the committee bill get a salary of $10,000, and next year we might divide that State into two districts and the Federal judge to be appointed under the committee bill would get $7,500? There would be two districts of the same size, with one judge getting $10,000 and the other $7,500.

Mr. MAGEE. Who would divide the State into two districts?

Mr. WALSH. The Congress.

Mr. MAGEE. The question would then come before you. I assume, if any such question does come before the House hereafter, that the House will exercise its judgment and horse sense in doing whatever is fair and just in reference to the proposition. And that is the point exactly. I have not any fault to find with any man's views, and I respect the man who differs with me in opinion. My only purpose is to be fair and just.

Take it in my own State, further. We have more than 60 counties in the State of New York. Yet I venture to assert, and I think the record will bear me out, that so far as the county judges in the State are concerned, that no two of them receive the same salary. A judge in a county like Albany, Onondaga, Oneida, Monroe, or Erie, where there is a large population, receives a much larger annual salary than a county judge of a less populous county.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MAGEE. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Do the judges in the city of New York, who receive $17,500, average higher in point of ability and character than judges up State who receive only $10,000?

Mr. MAGEE. I am not going to pass upon the legal ability of any man on the bench. That is not the point I make at all. The point I make is that we ought to take into consideration the cost of living in a locality and we ought to take——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAGEE. I would like just half a minute more.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MAGEE. And we ought to take into consideration also the work required of the judge. I have talked with justices up the State about the justices in the city of New York, and they are willing to concede that a justice in the city of New York is required to do more work than a justice up State; that the duties required of him are greater and the cost of living is more. They do not find fault because the justices in New York City get more pay than they. They consider it fair and just, and I think that we ought to be fair and just. It is not fair to say that they are coming here to plead their own cause or came before the Judiciary Committee to do so. I do not look upon the question in that light at all. They impressed me that they came very reluctantly before the Committee on the Judiciary. They came there because we wanted them to come and hear what they had to say. And when you hear a judge whose name is almost a household word all over these United States say to you that the salary which he receives is barely sufficient to afford him and his family the necessaries of life, it seems to me it is time for the House to take into consideration the condition that actually exists. We ought to be fair in dealing with the judges of our courts. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. MAGEE. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In the case of the county judges in the gentleman's State, to whom he has referred, are those judges paid out of the county treasury or out of the State treasury?

Mr. MAGEE. I think that the salaries are fixed by the State and paid by the respective counties. That is my opinion.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. That is correct.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAGEE. I will.

Mr. LITTLE. Did any of these gentlemen testify they could not live on $8,000 a year?

Mr. MAGEE. I did not hear any gentleman testify.

Mr. LITTLE. You did not hear——

Mr. MAGEE. Any gentleman testify.

Mr. LITTLE. Or make any statement that he could not live on $8,000?

Mr. MAGEE. The statements they made are in the hearings of the committee, I think. You can find them there.

Mr. LITTLE. I suspected that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SCOTT of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall vote for the amendment, either upon the basis of $7,500 level salary or $8,000.

Objection has come from some members of the committee to this amendment, generally, I think, based on one or two grounds: First, that a graduated scale of salaries will bring out a better class of men for the position; and, second, that it accords more equitably with the amount of work in the respective districts.

I do not believe that either one of these contentions is borne out by the truth. I concede the contention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] that there are many lawyers in the large cities who can command large incomes, notably men long trained in corporation law and having large corporations as their clientele. But I say it seriously, gentlemen, I am not yet ready to concede that that class of men affords the best material, the most desirable material, to place upon the Federal bench of the United States. My experience in the practice of law for 30 years—and I have had considerable practice in the Federal courts—leads me to believe that from the country towns of considerable size, from the smaller cities, from the large cities among that class of lawyers who have not attained the highest remuneration, you find the best, the soundest, and most reliable minds and characters.

Now, with respect to the amount of work done by men acting as judges in the centers of population as compared with those in districts more rurally situated, I do not agree with the gentlemen in their contention. Take, for instance, my own district. It embraces half of Iowa—a Western State. It contains no large cities, but it contains four divisions, and in that district one judge is compelled to hold terms of court in every one of those divisions. We all know, those of us who have practiced law, that in connection with every term of court there is a great deal of work that goes on, whether that term be short or long, and that there is much greater work in holding four terms of court in different parts of a State than there is in connection with holding the same number of days at one place and in one term.

Now, again, I venture to say that there is not one of these judges in the large centers of population but would, by choice, rather sit at home all the time, where he can be with his family all of the time, eating at his own table, than go out in a rural district, embracing a whole State or half a State, and in some instances two States, and be away from his home three-fourths or five-sixths of his time, traveling about and subject to all the inconveniences of traveling away from home. These are burdens; these are matters that should be considered with respect to those judges who are not located in centers of population. They are men whose mental attainments, whose moral attainments, and whose general judicial character equal those of any who may reside in the centers of population.

The very essence of the judicial system is uniformity and equality. We have not a hundred or more district courts in the United States. We have but one district court in the United States, and its jurisdiction extends throughout the whole territory of the United States, and all men upon the bench of that court should be treated alike. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time there is remaining to those who favor the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has four minutes remaining. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we seem in our discussion of this amendment to have lost sight of what really is before the House, or at least many of those who have been discussing the question seem to have lost sight of it.

The question is a simple one, whether we shall increase the salaries at a flat rate, making $7,500 the salary throughout the United States, or whether we shall make increases differing in the different parts of the United States according to population.

I take it that there is no substantial difference in this body upon the question as to whether or not there should be an increase. I take it that there is substantial agreement in this body that there should be an increase, and both amendments are directed to an increase.

One or two gentlemen seemed to feel that there should not be an increase at all. My learned friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] recognizes the fact that the general opinion of the House was not against dividing it according to population, because the consensus of opinion of all of those who have spoken, or a great majority of those who have spoken, seemed to be in favor of dividing according to population. Then the gentleman from Ohio says that the judges that came here were unanimous in favor of the proposition because of an increase of salary. That was not at all what the Committee on the Judiciary reported. They did not come here primarily to advocate an increase of salary, and yet they have the same right as any other employee has to advocate an increase of salary. But they came here at the request of the Committee on the Judiciary to tell how that increase should be made, the manner of the increase. Although numbers of those who came came from districts where the increase would be small, although many who came came from the districts where the increase would be $500 as against the possible increase of $4,000, yet they were unanimous in saying that the increase should be according to population.

Then the gentleman from Ohio says: "Why, the postmaster should not be a criterion; the collector of customs can not furnish an example, because in those instances you award your compensation according to the amount of money that is collected." Why, yes; you award it according to the amount of business that is done, and it is measured in that instance by money. In the instances of judges it is measured by the amount of judicial business which they transact, and the one is just as good a gauge as the other. And then, to clinch his argument, the gentleman from Ohio says: "Why, if you are going to make a difference with judges, why not make a difference with Members of Congress?" He forgets that Members of Congress are based upon population according to the census nearest to the election. So you have, so far as Members of Congress are concerned, a basis absolutely and wholly upon population, and upon population ascertained in the most exact and careful way.

So I say, gentlemen, if you go into any of the States in this Union you will find that where judicial officers are chosen by the localities they receive salaries according to the size of the population. You will see that if there is a large county with a small county adjoining it the large county will pay a salary of $6,000 or $8,000 or $10,000 a year to its county judge or surrogate or probate officer, and you will see that if the adjoining county has a population of one-fifth the salary will be proportionately smaller. You will find that condition all over the country.

And then the gentleman from Ohio says we should not be bound by precedent. He said we would simply be reviving a bad precedent. Why, the bad precedent prevailed for a hundred years, and the trial of something else has lasted only about 10 years, and we have found that it is a bad thing, and after consultation with the judiciary itself the Judiciary Committee came in here and all but one of the members of that committee recommend that the method provided by this bill be adopted. I say to you, gentlemen, that as we look at this question we find that salaries should be increased, we find that the precedent of 100 years, against the precedent for 10 years, has been for increasing it in this way, and when we look at the various States we find that in every State in the Union where there is a large county you have large salaries, and where there is a small county you have small salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman use his time?

Mr. WALSH. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, after listening to this prolonged discussion, I take it that the object and purpose of this bill providing for an increase of salaries is that there may be attracted to the judiciary more competent men. In Pennsylvania we have increased the salaries of the common pleas judges to $6,000 a year, and I dare say that there is no State in the Union that can show more capable judges than the State of Pennsylvania. We have such a high regard for the judiciary in Pennsylvania, from whence came that master mind of jurisprudence, John Bannister Gibson, and another and one of the greatest jurists of the past century, Justice Agnew, that we have abolished the system of nominating judges by political parties, and we strive to secure the best that can be had through a nonpartisan ballot. In two judicial districts in my congressional district there are two Democratic judges selected on the nonpartisan theory. And in the district represented by my friend Mr. LESHER they have two judges who were elected on the same theory.

I do not agree with my friend from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], who says that he is here to protect the taxpayers of his district by keeping down the salaries of the judges. It is my opinion that if good, decent salaries attract to the bench more efficient judges, then indeed by that method alone do you save money for the taxpayers, so far as the judiciary are concerned. For instead of getting judges who are inefficient, as my friend said, getting hundred-dollar men for hundred-dollar salaries, we get high-class, efficient men, and instead of 50 per cent of their cases being reversed for their erroneous decisions on law points and sent back for expensive retrial, we will get 90 per cent or 95 per cent or 100 per cent men if you give them 100 per cent salaries. That is the object and purpose, to my mind, and it is well contended here that inasmuch as the purchasing power of a dollar to-day is but 47 per cent of what it was in 1914, with the salaries of railroad employees and of men engaged in every vocation raised from 50 to 200 and 500 per cent, what objection can be offered against raising the salaries of efficient judges? No argument can be offered to refute the proposition that a man living in a large city has to pay more to subsist than a man living in the country. We all know that to be the fact. Therefore, while I am satisfied to vote for $8,000 or $9,000, I hope that the bill may go through in such form as to pay the difference between what it costs in the country and what it costs in the city. In any event we may all feel highly justified in voting for an increase, as increases are being paid everywhere, and in the present instance increases are contemplated to bring efficiency and consequent ultimate economy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] has three minutes remaining.

Mr. STEELE. We have no further time to take up, and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that that amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON to the amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Strike out "$8,000" and insert "$7,500."

The question was taken; and, on a division, there were—ayes 72, noes 72.

The CHAIRMAN. On this vote the ayes are 72 and the noes are 72, and the Chair votes aye.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. WEBB and Mr. STEVENSON.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 84.

Accordingly, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BARKLEY). The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] as amended.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 82, noes 62.

Accordingly, the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY: Strike out the paragraph.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, may we not have that paragraph reported?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. My motion is to strike out the section that has just been amended.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to hear what is being said. What is the motion?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BORLAND). Will the gentleman from Illinois state his amendment and what section it applies to?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Section 2.

Mr. ROBBINS. That has not been read.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I move to strike out the section that has just been amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The section which has just been amended is section 1 of the bill, which includes section 2 of the Judicial Code.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I move to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY moves to strike out the following, page 1, line 7:

"SEC. 2. Each of the district judges shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk has not correctly reported the motion. The gentleman moves to strike out section 1.

Mr. WALSH. No; he is moving to strike out the section which has just been amended.

Mr. MANN. That is section 1 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read section 1 of the bill.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. As amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY moves to strike out section 1, which reads as follows——

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. As amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. Each of the district judges shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year, to be paid in monthly installments."

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. What was the agreement in the committee as to the time of debate on the amendment and all amendments thereto?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty minutes was allowed on each side of the Stevenson and Walsh amendments.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to understand what we are voting on. As I understand it, section 2 as numbered here is section 2 of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the House has just amended section 1 of the bill, which includes section 2 of the Judicial Code. The gentleman from Illinois now moves to strike out section 1 of the bill as amended. The Clerk will read section 1 as amended.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. There is section 2 on the first page of the bill, line 7. That section 2 runs down through page 2 onto page 3. Is that section 2 the entity which the gentleman from Illinois proposes to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands it. The gentleman moved to strike out section 1 of the bill as amended. The Clerk will report section 1 as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. Each of the district judges shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year, to be paid in monthly installments."

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is to strike out the section as amended. The amendment has this effect: The amendment fixes the salaries of the district judges uniformly at $7,500 per year. This still leaves the salaries of the circuit judges at the rate fixed by the bill. In other words, this amendment does not satisfy anybody. The section as amended now does not meet with the approval of the committee, it does not meet with the approval of any of the judges, and it does not meet with the approval of this House.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The section that deals with the salaries of the circuit judges has not yet been reached. It is not accurate to say that the amendment will leave them as fixed by the bill, because I think that there will be a motion to amend that when we get to it.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. There is no doubt there will be a motion to amend it. We are told by the committee that the judges unanimously favored the increase in their salaries and that they favored the increase suggested by the committee according to the graduated methods in this bill. As I stand here, through 130 years of time there comes ringing down to me the prophetic voice of Thomas Jefferson. I wish I could quote his exact language. In effect he said: "The Federal judiciary is the great object of my fears. That body, with resistless footsteps and unalarming advance, proceeds to gather unto itself more and more power."

In the days of Thomas Jefferson this body was composed largely of men who came directly from the land. Even Thomas Jefferson could hardly have foreseen in his criticism of the Federal judiciary and their great powers that 130 years from that time this body would be composed entirely of lawyers who practiced, all of them, before the Federal judiciary. And he could hardly have foreseen that a united Federal judiciary would come before this body, the majority of whom practice before them, and ask the men who practice in their courts to increase their salaries. And yet that is the situation which confronts us to-day. We are told that they did not initiate this proposition themselves. Nobody has heard that they are opposed to it. We are told that suggestions came from the bar associations throughout the United States. I am not much impressed with a suggestion of this character that comes from the bar associations of the United States, because I remember distinctly the opposition of the bar associations, speaking for all the lawyers of this country, to being taxed. The American Bar Association and our State bar associations throughout the country held meetings and protested against the clause carried in the last revenue law which sought to impose a tax upon lawyers whose incomes exceeded $6,000 a year. The American Bar Association most violently in their resolutions protested against it and sent to each Member of this House, whether he was a lawyer or belonged to some other profession or calling, a copy of the resolutions. The bar associations of the different States sent representatives here to lobby with the committee and the membership of this House, protesting against this tax. In that clause we taxed physicians and surgeons, and not a single physician or surgeon in the United States protested against the tax. It remained—and I blush to make the statement—for the lawyers to do it throughout this country. They have already won their fight against paying this tax, and they are about to win their fight to take money out of the National Treasury and divide it up among the judges before whom they practice.

The lawyers who protested most violently in the hour of this country's peril against being taxed appear here now, insisting that this additional sum shall be taken out in peace times from the Treasury of the United States. They come not with clean hands. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and on a division, demanded by Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY, there were—ayes 28, noes 91.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first word of the section, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the Members of the House may have noticed in the morning paper an item in reference to the increased use of the telephone and telegraph wires. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read in my time an item which appeared in the Washington Post of this morning.

The Clerk read as follows:

FIVE MAY USE ONE PAIR PHONE WIRES—NEW INVENTION ALLOWS 40 TELEGRAPH MESSAGES TO BE SENT AT ONE TIME.

Postmaster General Burleson yesterday made public a letter from Theodore N. Vail, president of the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., announcing the invention and development by the technical staff of the Bell system of "a practical system of multiplex telephony and telegraphy, by the use of which it is now possible to increase manyfold the message-carrying capacity of long-distance telephone and telegraph wires."

"With this new system," said Mr. Vail's letter, "four telephone conversations over one pair of wires are simultaneously carried on, in addition to the telephone conversations provided by the ordinary methods. Thus, over a single pair of wires a total of five telephone conversations are simultaneously operated.

"In telegraphy as well as in telephony sensational results have been attained by the new system.

"The nature of these developments is such that, if desired, wires may be used partly for telephone and partly for telegraph. A pair of wires is available either for 5 simultaneous telephone conversations or for 40 simultaneous telegraph messages, or partly for one and partly for the other."

Mr. Vail said that an installation of the multiplex telephone system between Baltimore and Pittsburgh had been in service for more than a month.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen of the House will readily recognize the tremendous importance of any new invention or scheme which will permit one telegraph wire to be used for the transmission of 40 messages at the same time. It is now claimed, I believe, that under certain conditions one wire may be used for the transmission of four messages, though I think it is seldom, in practice, used for more than two messages at one time, and the use of one telephone wire for the transmission of five telephone conversations going on at the same time will be a matter of remarkable economy and efficiency. I call attention to this because the matter in a way originated in the House of Representatives. In the appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1910, which was passed in the Sixtieth Congress, there was the following item in the Army appropriation bill:

Wireless telephone apparatus: For the purchase and development of wireless telephone apparatus, $30,000.

In the deficiency appropriation bill in the Sixty-first Congress there was this item:

The funds appropriated in the act approved March 3, 1909, for the purchase and development of wireless telephone apparatus are hereby made available for the purposes heretofore appropriated during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911.

We are constantly making appropriations for investigation and research in the various branches of the Government. Sometimes they produce wonderful positive results, and sometimes they produce valuable negative results. As a rule, they add something to the information of the public, even if they do not accomplish any other good. Proceeding under these appropriations, or this appropriation as reappropriated, the Signal Service branch of the Army undertook to develop something along the line of what is now known as wired wireless telegraphy. We are all more or less familiar with the idea of sticking a post high up in the air, connected in a way with wires, and sending forth an energy from that wire which diffuses everywhere throughout space in every direction. These gentlemen in the Army, or some of them—and I think particularly probably it was the man who then had charge of this branch of the service, now the general in charge of the Signal Service, then Maj. Squiers, under Gen. Allen, who was then the Chief Signal Officer—conceived the notion that there might be a method, not of scattering the energy in every direction, but possibly a method could be devised of controlling the energy so that it would run along a wire and instead of being scattered all around could be concentrated along a wire. In 1911 four patents were issued to Maj. Squiers, now Gen. Squiers, for the benefit of any person in the United States, for this wired wireless. I can not undertake to speak technically or to explain it so that technical people could understand, but the theory is that by not such a high frequency as is used with the wireless, but still a high frequency as compared with the ordinary telegraph, they send a power along the wire, on the outside of the wire, possibly penetrating a very slight distance into the wire, and while a telephone message under this perfected apparatus can be sent through the wire by the electrical energy that is passing through it, by this high frequency they can send by the telephone four messages which go on outside of the wire. I am told there is an advantage in that. We are all familiar with the noises which come from contact with the earth of the telephone wire. This wired wireless on the outside of the wire does not have those noises, and is perfectly plain.

The present process is patented in the interest of the people of the United States for the benefit of anyone. Of course, great credit is due to Mr. Vail and the American Telephone Co. for having taken up this idea and developing the apparatus especially for its use in commercial purposes. A number of years ago while these experiments were going on there were wires in use between the Bureau of Standards and the War Department, and I was told long ago at one time that the telephone company, which had rented a wire to the people in the Signal Service, were very much surprised, if not slightly chagrined, to learn that they were using the outside of the wire, without the telephone company ever having discovered that there was any disturbance or use of it at all. It is said this scheme is now in use between Pittsburgh and Baltimore. I am not familiar with any part of the new discoveries, except as stated in this article, but we can all recognize that the House, seldom complimented from the outside, may take a compliment to itself in that it provided the funds in the first instance for making an experimental use of the telephone, which is likely to make a greater change in the operation of telegraph and telephones than any that has been made, except in the origin in the first place. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, when I read the article in the paper this morning to which the gentleman has referred my memory ran back to an address delivered here in the House—a very brief address, as I recall it—by Mr. Samuel Smith, of Michigan, then the chairman of the Committee of the District of Columbia. I suppose that must have been in the Sixty-first Congress.

Mr. MANN. In connection with the Telepost Co., I suppose.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In connection with the Telepost Co., in which he undertook to state what had been developed by this company, and I think I remember that he referred very lucidly to this question. Was that in connection with an appropriation that we made that he spoke?

Mr. MANN. No; that had nothing to do with an appropriation we had made and had nothing to do with this.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Had nothing to do with this?

Mr. MANN. And I do not think the Telepost Co. knew anything about it.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me in his time to say a word?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Both the article which most of us must have read and the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois are interesting—very interesting. The gentleman is always more capable of calling our attention to what Congress has done in the past than any man on the floor on either side, and always does it with accuracy and in a very pleasing way. If I can get the gentleman, with his wonderful power, to suggest to the man who invented the wonderful contrivance by which four people can talk at once to develop a plan to make the telephone operator four times as efficient the gentleman will be a benefactor to the world.

Mr. MANN. If I can invent a scheme by which one person could talk at all through the telephone I should be very much pleased with myself, or if I can invent a scheme by which one person can get a chance at a telephone once in a while I should be very much pleased with myself, but I apprehend this system will be put in practical use, and it will make a great deal of difference even about the "hello" girls. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 118 of the act aforesaid be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 118. There shall be in the second, seventh, and eighth circuits, respectively, four circuit judges; in the fourth circuit, two circuit judges; and in each of the other circuits, three circuit judges, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each circuit judge shall reside within his circuit. The circuit judges in each circuit shall be judges of the circuit court of appeals in that circuit, and it shall be the duty of each circuit judge in each circuit to sit as one of the judges of the circuit court of appeals in that circuit from time to time according to law: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent any circuit judge holding district court or otherwise, as provided for and authorized in other sections of this act. The circuit judges shall receive, respectively, a salary equal to $1,000 in excess of the highest salary paid, under the provisions of section 2 of this act, to any of the district judges of the judicial districts comprised within the judicial circuit for or from which the said circuit judges shall be appointed. Such salaries shall be paid in equal monthly installments, beginning on the first day of the month next following the approval of this act, and the amount to be so paid in the several circuits, under the provisions of this act, shall, from time to time, be ascertained and certified to the proper disbursing officer or officers by the Attorney General of the United States, and, when subject to be changed, become effective, as provided in section 2 of this act: Provided, however, That at no time shall the salary of any circuit judge be diminished during his continuance in office, nor shall the salary of any circuit judge at any time exceed the sum of $11,000 a year."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 10, after the word "Senate," insert "They shall receive a salary of $8,500 a year each, payable monthly," and strike out all the remainder of the section after line 18 on page 3.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as the House knows, the present judges of the circuit court of appeals receive $1,000 more than the district judges are now receiving under the law, namely, $7,000. The House has declared its judgment in favor of a flat salary increase for all the district judges at $7,500. This amendment I have proposed conforms to the established policy of the Government in paying the judges of the circuit court of appeals $1,000 additional, or $8,500. In fact, the bill as it is written recognizes the idea of providing $1,000 additional to that paid to the district judges receiving——

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the bill is left standing just as it is, will it not pay all of them $8,500; in other words, $1,000 more than the district judge? The district judge is fixed at $7,500 and it will leave it exactly where the gentleman would leave it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but there is language written into the bill by the Judiciary Committee to have it harmonize with the plan of salary increase based on population. The amendment I have proposed is virtually the identical language of the Judicial Code, section 118, with the exception that instead of $7,000 I substitute $8,500. In further answer to the remark of the gentleman from South Carolina, I direct his attention to the incongruity in the language which would follow by reason of the language in the proviso on page 4:

Provided, however, That at no time shall the salary of any circuit judge be diminished during his continuance in office, nor shall the salary of any circuit judge at any time exceed the sum of $11,000 a year.

This language is not in harmony with the amendment that fixed the salary of the district judges at $7,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a separate section after section 2 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new section, following line 10, on page 4, the following:

"SEC. 3. That section 136 of the act aforesaid be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 136. The Court of Claims, established by act of February 24, 1855, shall be continued. It shall consist of a chief justice and four judges, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to hold their offices during good behavior. Each of them shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and to discharge faithfully the duties of his office. The chief justice shall be entitled to receive an annual salary of $8,000 and each of the other judges an annual salary of $7,500, payable monthly, from the Treasury.'"

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment just offered.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a reenactment of section 136 in the Judicial Code down to the point where the salaries of the judges are fixed. The amendment increases the salaries by $1,500. It gives the Chief Justice of the Court of Claims, who now receives $6,500, $8,000, and the other members of the court $7,500 a year, the sum that has been provided in this bill for district judges. The other members of the court get now $6,000 apiece. I think, Mr. Chairman, this amendment should appeal to every Member of this House. It has been recognized by the Committee on the Judiciary and by the members of the Committee of the Whole that owing to the increased cost of living, increased work of the judges, some increase should be made in their salaries, and I believe it is generally conceded that there is no place in this country where the cost of living is higher than it is in Washington.

This is a most important court. Its jurisdiction extends to cases from all over the country and its work has been tremendously increased as a result of war and recent legislation.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield? When does the term expire under the present statute?

Mr. FLOOD. It does not expire at all. Does the gentleman mean when do the terms of the judges expire? They are appointed for life or during good behavior.

Mr. LITTLE. If we do not enact this will the court terminate?

Mr. FLOOD. No; this is simply an amendment to the present law to increase the salaries of the judges $1,500.

Mr. LITTLE. I get the gentleman now.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Outside of the salary increase there are no changes in the gentleman's amendment in the present law?

Mr. FLOOD. None at all. It does not change the number. There are five now. This amendment provides for five and simply makes an increase of $1,500 to each judge of this court.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOOD. I will.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman offers his amendment as being in line with the idea of increasing the salaries of the district and circuit judges?

Mr. FLOOD. I do.

Mr. MANN. Why should we not at the same time increase the salaries of the Customs Court judges or the District Supreme Court judges, or the District Court of Appeals judges, and other Federal judges, who are practically Federal judges?

Mr. FLOOD. Here in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. I am in favor of doing that, but I did not care to put it in this particular amendment, because I did not think this was a proper place to put it. I am very heartily in favor of increasing those salaries.

Mr. MANN. I am not offering any amendment and do not intend to offer any along those lines, but it seems to me if we increase the salaries of one set of judges in the District of Columbia—and I think it is a proper increase if it comes in the proper way—it ought to be done at the same time with the others—in other words, not to make it understood that a judge gets his increase in the District of Columbia as a mere matter of wire-pulling with Congress. That is perfectly proper, and I assume that the gentleman is familiar with some of the judges of the Court of Claims, and thinks that they ought to be protected?

Mr. FLOOD. I know some of the gentlemen.

Mr. MANN. I know some of the gentlemen, and I think the Court of Claims is very well thought of. But, apparently, no one in the Customs Court, so far as I have any indication, has any friend in this court. Whether anybody on the court of appeals or the District Supreme Court has somebody to speak for them here or not, I do not know.

Mr. REAVIS. I think it is only fair that, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] appears here as a special pleader, to say that he knew I had an amendment and was prepared to introduce it, providing for an increase for the court of appeals of the District and the Supreme Court of the District.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is some provision made for the increase of the salaries of the judges of the United States Court of Customs Appeals?

Mr. REAVIS. Not unless some other gentleman on the floor has charge of it.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims is a very large and important one. It has jurisdiction of cases from all over the country, contracts made with the United States covering river and harbor improvements, infringement of the patent laws, and many other matters that have come to that court as the result of recent enactments growing out of war legislation. The cost of living here is just as high as the cost of living anywhere else. It is one of our most important courts, and it does seem to me that if the district judges are to have their salaries increased to $7,500 the judges of the Court of Claims ought to get the same salary. They now get the same salary that the district judges get. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, under the reservation of the point of order, I wish to direct an inquiry to some member of the committee reporting this bill. I wish to inquire the reason for making a recommendation for increases for district and circuit judges when they did not make a recommendation for the increases of the judges of the Court of Claims, the judges of the Customs Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and other minor courts?

Mr. WEBB. I think I can answer my friend by saying that the Court of Claims and the Customs Court are special courts created by statute, and are separate courts from the district and circuit courts of the United States. Really, in my judgment, I think the judges of the Supreme Court of the District are included in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under what section?

Mr. WEBB. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that they are district courts of the United States and have district court jurisdiction plus what nisi prius jurisdiction arises here in Washington.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are the salaries of the members of the district court and of the Supreme Court of the District paid for under the general authorization of section 2 of the Judicial Code?

Mr. WEBB. There is another provision, I think, which makes the District of Columbia pay half the salaries of these District judges and the United States the other half. That is because probably more than half of the work done by these supreme court judges of the District arises in a local way in the District.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not there a separate section of the Judicial Code, or some other statute, that provides especially for the payment of the salaries of the members of the Supreme Court of the District?

Mr. WEBB. I think so. I think there is a provision somewhere that requires half of their salaries to be paid out of the funds of the District and half out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has not answered my original inquiry as to the reason why the committee did not consider the judges of the Court of Claims and the judges of the Court of Customs Appeals.

Mr. WEBB. I did not consider them as belonging to the judicial system of the United States. They are special courts and quite different than the district and circuit courts of the United States. But, frankly, I do not see why these judges should not be paid as much as any other judges in the District of Columbia, because the work is heavier than ever before and will be heavier from now on. The fact is they perform more drudgery work than any of the other judges.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserved the point of order so as to get the information. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman withhold that?

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order that it is not germane. I would like to be heard on the point of order. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to amend certain sections of what is known as the Judicial Code, and each of its sections, except the fourth section, which provides when the amendments to the Judicial Code shall take effect, is restricted to certain sections of the Judicial Code, namely, to section 2, section 118, and section 260. The first section applies to district judges. The second applies to circuit judges. The third applies to each of the judges of those two Federal courts.

Now, it is proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] to amend section 136 of the Judicial Code, which amendment is not related in any way to sections 2, 118, and 260. It relates to an entirely different court and to entirely different officials, and it seeks to increase the salaries of the judges of that court by incorporating a new section in this bill.

Now, I submit it is not competent for a committee having under consideration a bill limited to three sections of the Judicial Code, covering two branches of the judicial system, to amend that measure by incorporating an increase of salaries for another branch of the judicial machinery of the United States.

If this amendment were in order it would be in order to offer amendments to increase the compensation of the referees in bankruptcy or the clerks of the courts, the United States marshals, and all the other officials and officers of the judiciary, which are provided for in the Judicial Code.

I want to direct the Chair's attention to section 781 of the Manual, which is to the effect that simply because the matters may be related they are not necessarily germane, where it is held that on a proposition to enact a general tariff bill it was not in order to provide for a tariff board.

Now, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in a measure such as this the only germane amendment that can be offered must be to the branches of the judiciary that are provided for in this bill and to the provisions that are made in the bill with respect to those two courts.

I think that is all I have to say. I believe the gentleman from Illinois wishes to submit his views.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think we are all familiar with the general rule, that where there is only one specific provision in a bill it is not in order to offer an amendment relating to some other specific provision; also that where there are two specific provisions in a bill it is in order to offer an amendment relating to a third specific provision of the same class. Those decisions have been so common and so frequent that there can be no controversy about the general statement.

Now this bill is a bill to amend the judiciary title. It contains two sections relating to the salaries of district and circuit judges. It contains two sections relating to the appointment, I believe, of district and circuit judges. It covers practically the subject of at least district and circuit judges.

It would not be in order, Mr. Chairman, I take it, to offer an amendment to this bill relating to judges which affected, for instance, the appointment of a marshal or a district attorney, although they are connected with the court. But here is a bill which undertakes to fix the salaries of Federal judges throughout the country.

Now, the Court of Claims is as much a Federal court as the district court or the circuit court, and to say that we can fix the salaries of the two classes of judges—the district judges and the circuit judges, two classes—but can not fix the salaries at the same time of another class of Federal judges, seems to me to be overruling all the precedents and all the rulings.

If this bill were brought in simply to cover the salaries of district judges, then you could not offer an amendment to fix the salaries of circuit judges. If it had been brought in to fix merely the salaries of circuit judges you could not have brought in an amendment to fix the salaries of district judges. But the bill coming in to fix the salaries of two classes of Federal judges, it seems to me it is in order to offer an amendment to fix the salaries of another class of Federal judges, almost on all fours with the general proposition that if you have a bill here for the construction of one public building or the admission of one Territory it is not in order to offer an amendment for the construction of another public building or the admission of another Territory, but if you have a bill here for the construction of two buildings you can add a third, or if you have a bill for the admission of two Territories you can add a third, being along the same line.

If it were an entirely different class and introduced a different subject matter entirely, it would not be in order. But this does not introduce a different subject matter. The subject matter of this bill is the salary. It introduces a third class of Federal courts, where two classes are already embraced in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the Chair in determining whether or not this amendment is in order must consider the bill as it is presented to the House for consideration. If the Chair holds that the amendment is in order, then the Chair would have to hold in order any amendment amending any section of the Judicial Code. If the bill that has been presented were a general bill, amending generally the salaries of district and circuit judges, without regard to the amendment of certain sections of the Judicial Code, you might hold consistently that an amendment extending it to a third class, namely, the Court of Claims, would be in order. But this bill in its very form, as presented, shows that the Committee on the Judiciary merely considered the amendment of three sections of the Judicial Code, namely, section 2, section 118, and section 260. Any germane amendment to any of these sections when offered would be in order.

But I respectfully contend that it is not within the power of the committee to offer an amendment amending any other section of the Judicial Code, even though it relates to salaries, because this bill is a bill amending only these sections, and the amendments that might be offered must be limited to germane amendments connected with that section.

We had the very question up here three years ago, as I recollect—perhaps four years ago—on the Post Office appropriation bill. That committee brought in, with other amendments, two or three—three, as I recall—sections amending in minor particulars the Criminal Code. I would like to have the attention of the Chair; otherwise I do not care to proceed. That bill, brought into the House, amended three sections of the Criminal Code referring to the transmission through the mails of matters involving fraud on the public; three sections, as I remember, amending three different sections in minor particulars of the Criminal Code. The gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] attempted to annex an amendment that would have been in order if he could have used some other section of the Criminal Code, but it was not germane to the amendments of the sections of the Criminal Code that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads had recommended and which were under consideration in the House.

I then argued, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. Fitzgerald, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] joined in the argument and supported my position, pointing out to Speaker CLARK that if a bill was brought into the House amending three sections of the Criminal Code it would not be in order to offer an amendment changing another section of the Criminal Code. I have asked Mr. Sabine, in charge of the library, to find that debate for me. After a long argument, running perhaps an hour or more, the Speaker held that the amendment of the gentleman from California was not in order.

In determining whether this amendment is germane the Chair can not pass upon the kindred character of the subjects involved in the subjects under consideration. The whole question is, Is there before the House consideration of the subject matter relating to the salary increases of the judges of the Court of Claims? And the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary admits that they did not even consider that subject. The very rule of germaneness is for the protection of the House, so as not to take up for consideration matters that have not been considered, or given even subsidiary consideration, by the committee considering the main proposition.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman undertake to differentiate between the circuit and district courts, and the Court of Claims here in the District of Columbia, as affecting their jurisdiction or statutory powers? Are they not in the same class, as members of the Federal judiciary?

Mr. STAFFORD. I admit that it is, but I hold that the rules of the House must be observed, and that this bill as it was introduced and as it has been reported limits the consideration to germane amendments to three sections of the Judicial Code.

If this bill had attempted by another section some general amendment outside of the Judicial Code, whereby the Chair might hold that the whole sphere of legislation embodied in the Judicial Code was under consideration, that might be a handle on which to hang the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia. But for the safety and protection of the House the Chair should follow the ruling of Speaker CLARK, when a similar question was presented, that when a bill is presented amending two or three sections of the statute it is not in order to amend other sections of the statute.

Why, if this is in order we can amend any section of the Judicial Code. The Chair can not hold that we are limited only to amendments relating to salaries. The Chair can not rule that way, because these amendments are not limited merely to salaries. They include the termination of the office of the incumbent. Accordingly, anything that is germane or related to those sections may be amended. But if you are going to adhere to the prior rulings you can not take into consideration as germane any amendments to sections of the Judicial Code which are not before the House for consideration.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the Chair ready to rule on the proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] are so clearly within the established precedents that propositions of this sort are in order, that it seems to me the Chair will not hesitate; but I desire to call the attention of the Chair particularly to the section of the manual in which the precedents on this proposition are cited.

Section 780 is on the proposition that specific subjects are germane to general propositions of the class.

That was the reason I asked the gentleman from Wisconsin if he undertook to differentiate the class in which the Court of Claims fell, as contradistinguished from the circuit and district courts of the United States, and he very frankly admitted that there was no distinction in class. Therefore with that admission, which is undoubtedly correct, the status of the matter is brought clearly within the section which provides that a general subject may be amended by specific propositions of the same class. If the Chair will refer to those citations he will find that to a bill admitting several Territories into the Union, an amendment adding another Territory was held germane. To a bill providing for the construction of buildings in each of two cities an amendment providing for similar buildings in several other cities was held germane. To a resolution embodying two distinct phases of international relationship an amendment embodying a third was held germane.

So here we have the clear-cut proposition of an amendment offered which only attempts to bring a third entity of the same class within the purview of the provisions of the section, and it seems to me that under the logic of the situation as well as under the precedents there can be no question in the mind of the Chair as to the correct ruling on the proposition.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, just one suggestion. It will be understood, I think, by those who are familiar with the Judicial Code that it is an entity. It is a particular chapter of the law. It is chapter 231 of the statutes of the United States. All of the provisions of the Judicial Code are a unit, because they embrace all of the provisions of the statutes which until the time when they were codified and brought together were scattered throughout the statutes of the United States passed at different times. Now, those who are familiar with the Judicial Code know that we have the provisions for the circuit courts of the United States in a series of subdivisions of the Judicial Code. We have the provisions regarding the district courts of the United States in a series of subdivisions of the Judicial Code. We have the provisions regarding the Court of Claims in a still further subdivision of the Judicial Code. Embraced in the provisions for the district court is the provision for the salaries of the judges. Embraced in the particular subdivision for the circuit court are embraced the salaries of the circuit judges, and likewise for the judges of the Court of Claims. Now, we have this situation: We have a bill here which prescribes and fixes the salaries of the circuit judges and the district judges in the Judicial Code. They belong to the same class, the salaries of United States judges. Now, it is sought to further fix the salaries for another class of judges of the United States courts, to wit, the Court of Claims. I certainly think that is within the rule prescribed whereby when two of a class are included in a bill a third is germane. I think the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is absolutely correct, that if we should support the objection we would be overruling a long line of decisions. We have now here presented two provisions of the same class to which is to be added a third. It seems to me that it is within the rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair desires, the citation that I referred to I have now before me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is contained in volume 54 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, part 2, pages 1047 to 2104, second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

I direct the attention of the Chair to the debate found on pages 1486 and 1487.

As I stated to the Chair in my opening remarks, there were amendments carried in the bill to three different sections of the Criminal Code, and the gentleman from California offered an amendment to recommit and add a new section of a somewhat similar kind. The question was whether that amendment was germane, whether it could be considered, in view of the fact that it was not an amendment to the three sections offered by the Post Office Committee. Mr. SHERLEY made this argument:

Now, what is the fact? The fact is, if this was not an appropriation bill at all and you were undertaking to amend a section in the Penal Code, you could only amend it in order by offering an amendment that was germane to it, and in point of fact that was true as to the amendment carried in the bill.

Further on he says:

This would not be in order to this section if we had up the Penal Code and did not have up an appropriation bill at all, for the very plain reason that it is not in any sense germane to the section to which it is offered.

Everybody knows the rule to the effect that if you are dealing with two subjects it is germane to add an additional subject, but if you are dealing with one class it is not germane to add another class to that particular paragraph or section.

Permit me to say that the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] attempted by his first motion to recommit one of the sections that had been reported back to the House. Later he offered the new section, as follows:

Mr. RANDALL moves to recommit to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with instructions to report the same back forthwith, with the following amendment: Page 34, after line 13, insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. —. No letter, postal card, circular, pamphlet, newspaper, or publication of any kind, containing any advertisement or solicitation of a sale of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors, shall be deposited in or carried by the mails of the United States, or be delivered by any postmaster or letter carrier.

And so forth.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] made the point of order on the motion that it was legislation on an appropriation bill and not germane to anything in the bill. After an argument participated in only by gentlemen in favor of the proposition the Speaker sustained the point of order, as he did to the prior amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as I remember the case distinctly, the precedent cited by the gentleman from Wisconsin has no application whatever to the present case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Virginia presents an amendment in the form of a new section changing the salaries fixed by the judicial code for the judges of the Court of Claims. The point of order is made upon that amendment that it is not germane, in that the pending bill relates only to the salaries of certain of the United States judges, to wit, the United States district and circuit court judges, and that it is not in order by amendment to change the salary of other classes of the United States judges.

If the question related to any single section the question of germaneness would have to be measured by that section, but the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is presented as a new section to the bill itself.

The bill itself undertakes to change the salary of the United States district and circuit judges and the third section undertakes to regulate the right of retirement of the judges who are appointed to serve during good behavior. The answer is made to the point of order that while one specific proposition can not be amended by another specific proposition, yet the rule is limited by the further proposition that where the bill or proposition under consideration applies not to specific cases but to a general class of subjects the rule of germaneness must apply to that class, and that in this case the class affected by the bill are the judges of the United States courts.

The Chair has heard with much interest the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin based upon the point of order made to the Post Office appropriation bill last year. As the Chair recalls that, without looking over the argument at that time, the proposition was to amend several sections of the criminal code relating to matter that might be transmitted through the mails of a treasonable character.

It was proposed to amend that by introducing an amendment to another section of the code relating to the advertisement and solicitations for the sale of liquor. In the opinion of the Chair such an amendment was considered not to be germane because it did not relate to the subject matter of the bill under discussion.

In the case now before the House the Chair is constrained to say that he believes the rule is a salutary one, which confines the House and the committee to amendments clearly germane to the subject of the bill as presented by the committee to the House. But the precedents seem to indicate, and to the Chair's mind do indicate, that when the bill relates to a certain class of subjects an amendment is germane which relates to the same class of subjects, even though it may not be embraced in the same identical section. In this case there are three sections of the bill. The first section is amended in that portion which governs the salary of district judges and the second section relating to circuit judges. The third section relates to the retirement of judges of the courts of the United States who hold office during good behavior. By reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], section 136 of the Judicial Code, which he seeks to amend, provides:

The Court of Claims, established by act of February 24, 1855, shall be continued. It shall consist of a chief justice and four judges, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and hold their office during good behavior.

In other words, there are two propositions embraced in the bill before the House—one the change of salaries of certain judges of the United States and the other the right of retirement of certain judges of the United States. Any amendment which is urged to these propositions must be germane to both of those propositions. It must relate to the salaries of judges of the United States, or that class of judges who would be affected by the particular retirement law, which is also a part of the pending measure. In the opinion of the Chair, the judges of the Court of Claims of the District of Columbia are in the same general class as the judges provided for in the pending bill. Therefore an amendment altering their salaries is germane as an amendment to the pending bill. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the amendment. I very much hope that this amendment will not be agreed to. There has not been a person before the committee asking for an increase in the salaries of the judges of the Court of Claims. There has been before the committee, and there is pending now, a bill looking to giving to the court two masters. They have asked for these, and there have been extensive hearings. The judges of the court themselves have been before the committee and have asked for these two officers of the court, saying it would enable the court to do its work more satisfactorily, but no one suggested that a change in the salary of these judges was desirable or necessary. A proposition came before the committee, brought by an attorney of the District of Columbia and advocated by him solely, to increase the pay of the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. The committee did not agree to that, and, as I said, there was not any suggestion from any source that the judges of the Court of Claims should have an increase in their salary. I was never overly enthusiastic for this bill, but under certain conditions I was willing to vote for it. However, if we now, without an opportunity to know anything about the facts, are to have entirely unrelated increases in salaries applying to people who form no part of the judicial system as it was contemplated, I do not think the members of the committee ought to feel themselves under any obligation to support the changed measure. This is not a threat. I realize that it is nobody's concern as to how I vote. I am just expressing my opinion about it. I do not think an amendment increasing the salary of these men beyond the salary of the ordinary district court judge—particularly as these men have only a quasi judicial character to perform, because they have no jurisdiction of persons and merely pass on claims—should be placed in this bill, particularly in view of the fact that the judges themselves have never asked for it. When they were before the committee there was no contention that their salaries were not sufficient. They wanted to have two masters to aid the court in handling and summing up the facts. I sincerely hope that because there are meritorious cases of judges who have not only to deal with property but with the lives and liberties of American citizens, who have been underpaid, in the judgment of the committee, and therefore ought to be taken care of in a modest increase of salary, that that will not be assigned as a reason for rushing in and raising everybody's salary. It appears to me to be unwise; and, certainly, if you are going to increase the salaries of the judges of the Court of Claims I do not see why you should not increase the salaries of the Supreme Court and of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, or anyone else that, under the ruling of the Chair, could be brought within the provisions of the bill.

Mr. SWITZER. Has the Court of Claims power or jurisdiction to enforce its own decrees?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no.

Mr. BUTLER. It only finds the facts.

Mr. CARAWAY. It usually does not find them. I want to appeal to the friends of this measure, who believe, everything considered, that it ought to pass, not to load it down here by the increase of the salaries of men who themselves have never thought of asking for an increase of salary. There was no opportunity given to the committee to consider the matter and I sincerely hope the amendment will be voted down. I shall under the circumstances vote against the bill if the amendment is agreed to. If the chairman sees fit to consent to these changes without reference to the will of the committee, I regret to do it, but will do so.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. It does not follow at all because the Committee on the Judiciary has not considered the question of increasing the salaries of the judges of the Court of Claims, that therefore the House should not consider that germane amendment. After all is said and done, the committees of the House do not control the House.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. The bill as originally prepared sought to grant increases upon the basis of population. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia to increase the salaries of the judges of the Court of Claims takes no cognizance of that, and does not agree with the amendment offered a moment ago by the gentleman from South Carolina which fixes the salary at $7,500, but so arbitrarily fixes the salaries of these judges that they will be out of proportion to any other.

Mr. FLOOD. They are the same as district judges, they get the same salary as district judges, and this fixes the salary the same as the district judges.

Mr. CANNON. After all is said and done, the committees are the creation of the House and they do not bind the House. When the report of the committee comes before the House, whether the committee has investigated a particular matter or not, any germane amendment or any amendment in order under the rules of the House, it is proper to consider it in the House. I have high respect for the gentleman from Arkansas and I have high respect for the Committee on the Judiciary, and high respect for the other committees that prepare legislation for the consideration of the House, but, good God! when a measure comes in here to say that simply because the committee did not consider this or that amendment therefore the House ought not to agree to it is ridiculous. Just let me say a word. The fact that the judges of the Court of Claims have not appeared before the committee agonizing for an increase in their salaries perhaps is to the credit of the judges.

Well, let me tell you. I have some familiarity, being upon the Committee on Appropriations, having been appointed over a quarter of a century and its chairman for 14 years, I know about the important work done by the Court of Claims. It is a court that has long existed, and they have passed after great investigation on cases submitted to them wholesale. I think I can safely say they have passed on—I was going to say millions—but thousands and thousands of claims and have rendered judgment in many cases. There are many cases referred to that court for investigation and report to Congress, and such investigation means great labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I would like just two or three minutes longer, perhaps five minutes more; I will get through within that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERWOOD. What is the salary of the judges of the Court of Claims?

Mr. CANNON. Six thousand dollars, the same as district judges, and by amendment that has been increased to $7,500, and this amendment proposes to increase the salary by $1,500. Now, they render judgments that are final, involving hundreds of millions of dollars, subject to appeal, of course, to the Supreme Court of the United States. Many of them are not appealed, some of them are, and now at the close of this great war, with the great number of contracts that are being canceled, with the great number of claims that are to come before this court and will come before them, I submit that the amendment should be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FLOOD and Mr. BANKHEAD) there were—ayes 73, noes 27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 10, add as a new section the following:

"SEC. 4. The salary of the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia shall be $9,000, and the salary of each associate justice of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia shall be $8,500. The salary of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall be $8,000, and the salary of each associate justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall be $7,500. The salaries provided for in this section shall be paid as now provided by law."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. GARD. The point of order made against the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Nebraska is that neither are germane to the purposes in the bill. The title of the bill and the purpose of the bill is to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary." In that reference is made to three sections, the first being section 2 of that act and the next section 118 of that act and the third section 260 of that act. In the act relating to the judiciary certain courts are enumerated. They are courts of the United States. They are the district courts, they are the courts of claims, they are the Court of Customs Appeals, they are the circuit courts and the Supreme Court of the United States, and those are all the courts enumerated. Apart from that, there is a court created in the District of Columbia. Now, the District of Columbia, as everyone knows, is a Federal reservation, of which the Congress of the United States has complete legislative charge, and the jurisdiction of those courts enumerated in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska are peculiar to the District of Columbia and have no part in the general system of the judiciary. As I understood the ruling of the Chair a moment ago, it was to hold that any amendment might be in order which affected the general judicial code and the provisions which were sought to be carried in the general judicial code by reason of the purview of this bill. Now, the bill affects district judges of the United States, it affects circuit judges of the United States, and it affects those judges of the United States who are competent to retire under certain provisions, as set out in section 216. The amendment provides those judges shall be paid in accordance with existing law, and I ask the Chair's special attention to this. The bill we are considering is a bill which provides that the salaries of judges of the United States shall be paid out of the general revenues of the United States. The amendment which is offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] provides that half of those salaries is to be paid by the people of the United States, by the general taxpayers of the United States, and half through the revenues of the District of Columbia, thereby indicating a separate and distinct limited part of the judiciary, for such this is. The title of the judiciary, in so far as it affects the District of Columbia, is contained, not in the Judicial Code and not in the Statutes of the United States, but in a compilation of statutes in force for the District of Columbia. Very necessarily, owing to the peculiar character of this legislative and political reservation, laws and the administration of laws in the District of Columbia are entirely different from laws and the administration of laws outside of the District of Columbia. There is not the same general use, there is not the same general extension of authority, under this limited law as there is under the law affecting broadly the provisions of the Judicial Code.

In section 260 of this law which provides a new scheme of arrangement that one who is authorized to resign may, instead of resigning, retire, it provides how he may retire and what his designation may be. It provides upon his retiring the senior judge of the circuit may authorize him to perform such judicial duties as he is willing to perform, or the Chief Justice may authorize him to perform such judicial duties in any other circuit as such retired judge may be willing to undertake. There is no authority for the Chief Justice appointing any retired judge of the District of Columbia to any other work, nor is there any legislative or statutory authority for the sending of any judge of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia into any other territory for service. Their service is limited. It is limited in a territorial sense; it is limited in a judicial sense; it is limited for a very necessary purpose, that this District of Columbia is a Federal reservation for certain purposes, and the great purpose is the administration of law necessary to carry on the General Government within the Federal reservation.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, and make it, I say, upon the soundest sense of reason, that there can be no possible reason by which a judge of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia may be associated in any feature with the general judicial code of the United States, and, therefore, that any amendment proposed in this bill to that effect is not germane. I have no fault to find with the general scheme of compensation, because if there be any necessity for additional compensation, owing to increased cost of living, of course that may affect the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. But we are not at that point. And I make the point of order that there is absolutely no authority in this bill, or any law associated with the bill, for the purpose of amending it with an entirely foreign, distinct, and different court.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska desire to be heard?

Mr. REAVIS. Just a word, if I may, Mr. Chairman.

If the Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia is within what we know as the Federal courts, there can be no question that, according to the ruling made by the Chair a short time ago, this amendment is germane to the bill. It does not appeal to me as a matter of particular consequence whether the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia are a part of the judicial code which this bill seeks to amend. Under the ruling of the Chair, it would seem to me that that question was eliminated. In my judgment, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia are distinctly Federal tribunals, created by the Federal Congress. Of course, their jurisdiction is limited to the Federal reservation known as the District of Columbia, but the mere fact that they may not be comprehended in the judicial code and that their creation is a matter of statute without that code would not render this amendment subject and obnoxious to the point of order that it was not germane to the subject matter of this bill.

The subject matter of this bill, as I understand it, is for the purpose of fixing the salaries of the Federal judges. True, those judges prescribed by the legislation are judges whose salaries are fixed by the judicial code, and the legislation fixing a new salary would require an amendment to that judicial code. But that is merely a means to an end. An amendment of the judicial code is not the subject matter of the legislation. It is the salary to be paid to Federal judges. Now, if within the meaning of that term the judges of the Court of Appeals for this District and the judges of the Supreme Court for this District are within the class known as Federal judges, constituting what is known as Federal courts, then this amendment under the ruling of the Chair is germane. And I submit that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to direct the Chair's attention to one of the contentions of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], by saying that if the Chair will examine the judicial code he will see that the courts of the District of Columbia are not embraced within the Federal judicial system. They are a separate branch, but they have conferred upon them certain Federal jurisdiction. But they are not embraced within the judiciary of the United States, and if we can incorporate amendments here for the courts of the District of Columbia that are not embraced within the Federal Judicial Code we can offer an amendment, I submit, which amendment would be germane, to increase the salary of the territorial judges of Alaska and Hawaii; and that the ruling of the Chair, as applied to the court, contained in the amendment just adopted, if applied strictly to this amendment, must necessarily lead to the conclusion that this amendment falls outside of that class.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. REAVIS. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia has an appellate Federal jurisdiction, has it not?

Mr. WALSH. It has; conferred upon it by a special statute and not by the judicial code.

Mr. REAVIS. It has the power of review of certain decisions in the Patent Office and power of review of certain decisions of the Postmaster General—distinctly a Federal jurisdiction, is it not?

Mr. WALSH. Those particular powers are Federal powers; yes.

Mr. REAVIS. And could be conferred only by the Congress?

Mr. WALSH. But they have not been conferred by the judicial code, nor does that conferring of jurisdiction make them a part of the judicial system of the United States.

Mr. REAVIS. Then, if I understand the gentleman, the point of order, in his mind, is good, because the authority creating the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia is not within the judicial code?

Mr. WALSH. Because the authority conferring certain jurisdiction upon the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia does not make that a Federal court, except as confined to the particular jurisdiction conferred upon it.

Mr. REAVIS. It is a court having Federal jurisdiction but not a Federal court?

Mr. WALSH. In certain instances.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. On this point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. A question has been raised in argument here, Mr. Chairman, as to whether the judges of the courts here in the District of Columbia are properly within the purview of the general designation of United States judges; and in view of the fact that the Supreme Court has decided that matter I think it might be well to call the Chairman's attention to an adjudged case. In the case James against the United States, in the Two hundred and second United States Supreme Court Reports, the question arose under a statute which is the same statute which we will consider under section 260 of this bill.

When any judge of any court of the United States resigns his office, after having held his commission as such at least 10 years, and having attained the age of 70 years, he shall, during the residue of his natural life, receive the same salary which was by law payable to him at the time of his resignation.

Now, the Supreme Court, in passing upon the question as to whether that applies to judges in the District of Columbia, had the following to say:

On behalf of the Government it is, as we have said, contended that Justice James was not entitled to the benefit of this statute, because that statute only embraced judges of such courts of the United States as were within the purview of section 1 of Article III of the Constitution, and it is insisted the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia was not so embraced. We think the premise upon which this contention rests is wholly devoid of merit. The words of the statute, "when any judge of any court of the United States resigns his office," are broad enough to embrace all courts created by the United States, without taking into view the particular constitutional authority which was exercised in such creation. It is true that the statute excludes the conception that it was intended to apply to judges of courts created by Congress, when the term of office was of limited duration. Conversely, however, in our opinion, the text of the statute leaves no room for question that its provisions were intended to apply to a judge of any court of the United States holding his office by a life tenure, such as during good behavior. Indeed, as it is conceded at bar, that from the period of the enactment of the statute down to the present time it has, without interruption or deviation, been construed by the legislative and executive departments of the Government as applicable to justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, we do not deem it necessary to determine whether the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is an inferior court within the meaning of section 1 of Article III of the Constitution, since even if it be not a court of that character it is nevertheless a court of the United States within the meaning of Revised Statutes, section 714.

The section referred to is the one that will be hereafter discussed, and which is similar to section 260 in this bill. I think it right to state this to the Chairman, so that he may have the benefit of it in his ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thanks the gentleman. The Chair is ready to rule.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] presents an amendment increasing the salary of the chief justice and associate justices of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. The contention is made that this amendment is not germane to this bill; that these judges do not fall within the same general class as the judges whose salaries are affected by the bill under consideration by the House.

The question is not free from difficulty, because in a certain sense the judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia are United States judges; and yet they are judges of a local or Territorial character, taking the place in this Federal reservation of the Territorial judges in the Territories of the United States elsewhere. The question of germaneness does not depend wholly upon whether in some sense these judges are United States judges. If it did, then recourse might be had to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, cited by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. This bill which is before the House is a bill to amend an act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, this being the prime purpose of the bill before the House, and it amends the Judicial Code in certain particulars, namely, by increasing the salaries of certain classes of judges mentioned in that Judicial Code. Congress has placed the stamp of its opinion upon what constitutes the courts of the United States by defining in the Judicial Code the five courts or five branches of the court—the Supreme Court, the District Court, the Circuit Court, the Court of Customs Appeals, and the Court of Claims. Such being the judgment of Congress, it has defined the class to which the rule of germaneness must apply. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska does not seek to amend the act which this bill is directed to amend at all, but is simply directed at certain other courts which in a certain sense are also classed as courts of the United States. In the opinion of the Chair the point of order that the amendment is not germane is well taken, and the point of order is therefore sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 260 of the act aforesaid be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 260. That when any judge of any court of the United States, appointed to hold his office during good behavior, resigns his office after having held a commission or commissions as judge of any such court or courts at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years, he shall, during the residue of his natural life, receive the salary which is payable at the time of his resignation for the office that he held at the time of his resignation. But instead of resigning, any judge, other than a justice of the Supreme Court, who is qualified to resign under the foregoing provisions may retire, upon the salary of which he is then in receipt, from regular active service on the bench, and the President shall thereupon be authorized to appoint a successor; but a judge so retiring may nevertheless be called upon by the senior circuit judge of that circuit and be by him authorized to perform such judicial duties in such circuit as such retired judge may be willing to undertake, or he may be called upon by the Chief Justice and be by him authorized to perform such judicial duties in any other circuit as such retired judge may be willing to undertake.

"In the event any circuit judge or district judge, having so held a commission or commissions at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years as aforesaid, shall nevertheless remain in office and not resign or retire as aforesaid, the President, if he finds that any such judge is unable to discharge efficiently all the duties of his office by reason of mental or physical disability of permanent character, may, when necessary for the efficient dispatch of business, appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional circuit judge of the circuit or district judge of the district to which such disabled judge belongs. And the judge so entitled to resign or retire shall be held and treated as if junior in commission to the remaining judges of said court, who shall, in the order of the seniority of their respective commissions, exercise such powers and perform such duties as by law may be incident to seniority. In districts where there may be more than one district judge, if the judges or a majority of them, can not agree upon the appointment of officials of the court, then the senior judge shall have the power to make such appointments.

"Upon the death or resignation of any circuit or district judge so entitled to resign, following the appointment of any additional judge as herein provided, the vacancy caused by such death or resignation of the said judge so entitled to resign shall not be filled, but the number of judges then in office shall be reduced accordingly."

Mr. GARD and Mr. WALSH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment and ask that it be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Amend page 5, line 9, by striking out the period after the word "undertake" and inserting a comma and the following: "Or he may be called upon either by the presiding judge or senior judge of any other such court and be by him authorized to perform such judicial duties in such court as such retired judge may be willing to undertake."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was prepared and submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] and was inspired by a colloquy yesterday between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT], in which the gentleman from Iowa called attention to the fact that this section was in need of some clarification. This is simply offered to perfect the text in accordance with the idea advanced by the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 4, line 11, beginning with section 3, strike out the section down to and including line 11, on page 6.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, it seems that this will be the only mooted question remaining in the bill, and I should like to have some agreement as to the time that we shall consume in debating the amendment. I should like a suggestion from my friend as to how much time he will desire. I think the committee are anxious to finish the bill to-night, and I hope my friend from Massachusetts will assist us in that.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be very glad to do so. I think 15 or 20 minutes on a side will be sufficient.

Mr. WEBB. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this motion to strike out the section may close in 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be assigned to those in favor of the motion and 15 to those opposed to it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman make that 20 minutes on a side?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I will amend my request and make it 20 minutes on a side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this motion to strike out the paragraph and all amendments thereto——

Mr. MANN. There could be no amendment to his motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts close in 40 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Will my friend agree to make that request cover all debate on the section itself? Then we can give notice as to when we will vote on the bill. Has anyone any amendment to offer?

Mr. MANN. I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina with reference to the last paragraph of this section, to suggest a possible amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Very well. I will be very glad to have the gentleman do it.

Mr. MANN. This paragraph provides that—

Upon the death or resignation of any circuit or district judge, so entitled to resign, following the appointment of any additional judge as herein provided, the vacancy caused by such death or resignation of the said judge so entitled to resign shall not be filled, but the number of judges then in office shall be reduced accordingly.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I move to strike out the enacting clause of this bill.

Mr. MANN. Who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] is offering an amendment.

Mr. MANN. But who had the floor? We were having a debate here, and the gentleman from Louisiana was not recognized to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois, as the Chair understands, is asking a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. No. I was asking the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], who had the floor, a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman from North Carolina had the floor to prefer a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Nobody could take him off the floor by a motion, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would not the gentleman from Massachusetts have the floor on his motion to strike out, and was not an endeavor being made to come to an agreement as to time on that motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] offered an amendment, which was duly reported, and pending his being recognized to debate his amendment the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] rose, and by tacit consent preferred a request for unanimous consent. The whole matter is now before the committee.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Louisiana was recognized and had a right to make a preferential motion, had he not?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana rose to a parliamentary inquiry, as the Chair understood him, but the Chair is advised that at the proper time the gentleman's motion is preferential to a motion to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the Chair state when that time will arrive?

The CHAIRMAN. It will arrive when the gentleman from North Carolina yields the floor, and the question arises between the debate upon the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the preferential motion offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. WEBB. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may finish his question now.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Will this motion be in order during this debate of 20 minutes on a side?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that if the gentleman offers a preferential motion before debate is begun upon the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, he will be entitled to offer it.

Mr. MANN. The paragraph does not provide what shall happen if a judge retires. The bill provides that a man who reaches the age of 70, having served 10 years, may resign or retire. Nature provides that he may die. You say in the bill that if an extra judge has been appointed, and the man on the bench dies or resigns, that vacancy shall not be filled. But suppose he retires. Then you have provided in another place in the bill that an appointment shall be made to fill that vacancy. Evidently that is not what you want to do.

Mr. WEBB. That is the language that was used in the Senate and the House, and we thought it covered it.

Mr. MANN. Ought it not to provide that on the death, resignation, or retirement the vacancy should not be filled?

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, what is before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The question of unanimous consent asked by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. ASWELL. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ASWELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I make a motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers a preferential motion to strike out the enacting clause. The Clerk will report the motion.

Page 1, lines 1 and 2, strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to say one word. We are soon to have 2,000,000 American soldiers return here without anything except their uniform, and some gentlemen on the other side objected to giving them that. This Government owes nearly $40,000,000,000. This is no time to pass a bill of this kind. This bill is inexcusable and indefensible at this particular time, and I ask that my motion to strike out the enacting clause be supported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-three Members present, a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire the attention of the committee to the proposition that this section is unconstitutional, and for that reason I shall support the motion to strike it out. I want to call particular attention of the gentlemen of the committee to the language of the Constitution:

ARTICLE III.

SECTION 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

Now, this language follows:

The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Gentlemen who have any knowledge of the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention in formulating the Constitution know what difficulties the convention had to overcome. In the first place they desired to establish a Government that would be firm, that would be strong, and that would take the place of the unsatisfactory and weak confederation that had preceded it. They gave to the President of the United States very great constitutional powers, but they recognized at the same time that it was necessary that those powers should be very carefully limited. The principal thought in the minds of the members of the convention was that in order to secure such safeguards there should be a strong line of demarcation drawn between the three great divisions of the Government—the executive, judicial, and legislative. The various provisions of the Constitution were drawn with reference to that proposition. This provision of the Constitution which I have read was one to secure the judicial powers of the Government against the encroachment of the Executive power. If the Executive power, having created judges and then finding that they were unsatisfactory, could dismiss them as it could other appointees, then it gave the President the power to control the judiciary, and this they sought to prevent by the provisions in which they said that the judges should hold office for life or during good behavior, so that they could not be removed, and that their compensation should not be diminished, so that they might be starved out of office.

Now we have a provision in this bill which allows the Executive to do the very thing that the Constitution sought to prevent—in other words, to dismiss or discharge at his will, whenever he shall so determine, judges whom he has appointed, and whom the Constitution provides shall serve for life or during good behavior. That is the effect of the provision of this bill which this motion seeks to eliminate. Whenever the President shall conclude that any judge is incapacitated he may appoint a successor, who shall take over the duties of the office. To Congress is given the power to determine when additional judges are necessary; but this power and duty we surrender to the Executive. The Constitution declares that no one, not even the President, may remove an obnoxious judge. This provision gives the President that power.

That, gentlemen, is a violation of the Constitution of the United States. There is no way in which I think that can be avoided.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. For a brief question.

Mr. STEELE. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that when the circuit court of appeals was created the circuit court was abolished, and the circuit judges on the bench were stripped of their powers and were directed to perform the duties of district judges, and again when the commerce court was abolished they were divested of their powers and directed to perform the duties of district judges, and this legislation was sustained by the Supreme Court.

Mr. TOWNER. We have gone over that, and the very reason given by the Supreme Court was that they were not stripped of their powers; that they were given the same powers in existence before; that a mere change of name from circuit judge, having the same jurisdiction, did not deprive them of their office.

Mr. STEELE rose.

Mr. TOWNER. I can not go further with my explanation, if the gentleman will pardon me. When you say that a man shall be retired upon the request or the declaration or the demand of the President of the United States and that another shall take his place who can take all of the business that appertains to that office out of his hands, you not only retire him, but you, in effect, remove him from his office. In this provision you give to the President of the United States the power to say that whenever any judge is unsatisfactory in the performance of his duties under the circumstances stated he shall be removed and another substituted in his place.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Of course, this is a pretty big constitutional question that the gentleman is arguing.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; and I wish we had more time to devote to it.

Mr. WEBB. Does the gentleman think that so eminent a man as Mr. Justice Hughes would say he regards this provision as eminently wise if he thought it was unconstitutional?

Mr. TOWNER. I think that Judge Hughes never gave the constitutional question any consideration at that time.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes; Judge Hughes had this under consideration for quite a while.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; he did, in the section letter.

Mr. WALSH. There is not a word about the constitutionality of it.

Mr. WEBB. I read from the letter of June 27, 1918, addressed to Hon. H. J. STEELE:

> I was not in favor of the provisions embraced in House bill No. 11134, relating to the compulsory retirement of district judges, but these provisions have been eliminated, and under Hous' bill No. 12001 circuit and district judges have been put on the same basis with regard to retirement, and these provisions, it seems to me, are eminently wise.
> Very sincerely, yours,
> CHARLES E. HUGHES.

Mr. TOWNER. That does not reach the proposition. Judge Hughes may think such provisions wise, but, with the greatest respect, I can not agree with him as to their wisdom. But he does not say they are constitutional, and there is nothing to indicate that he considered the constitutional question. I think gentlemen ought to consider this simply upon its merits. The desire of gentlemen to provide a means by which some judge they have in mind might be gotten rid of in a method that is unconstitutional ought not to lead them to violate the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Was the rule adopted limiting debate, the rule to limit debate on the section and all amendments thereto?

The CHAIRMAN. The unanimous-consent request, as the Chair recalls it, was only upon the Walsh amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the motion before the committee is a motion to strike out section 260; and I would like to have the attention of the members of the committee, because what I have to say I am saying in support of the section as it stands and because I believe the section as it stands ought to be supported. The first part of this section makes no alteration in the existing law. The second part of the section introduces a new feature, and that is what has been denominated in these debates the retirement feature. I ask the members of the committee to remember that that retirement feature was in a bill reported by our committee, passed upon by the House, approved in this House, and passed by the Senate, so that the question is not a new one, but is one that has been approved and carries great benefits with it. I recall an instance in our third circuit where the matter was under consideration. The presiding judge of the circuit stated that it was his desire, if he had the power, to call in Judge Gray, who had resigned, but that he could not because the resignation cut off his official function. Therefore it was that he suggested the framing of such a bill as this, and the bill was framed and presented to the committee and considered by the House and passed, and was regarded as a most beneficial addition upon the question of the resignation of judges. It put as a reserve force those gentlemen who were able to discharge some of the duties of the office, but who wished to retire from the more active work after their service of 10 years, and passing the age of 70. They constituted a retired list which could be called upon, if they would be willing to serve, to help out in any emergency in the business and work of the court. I respectfully submit to you gentlemen that that paragraph ought to be retained irrespective of what your opinion may be of the last clause or section of the bill.

Mr. GILLETT. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts inadvertently included that, and that he is going to except that from his amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If he is, that removes any cause for further argument. But it has not been stated. His motion is to strike out the section.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman knows that I expected to ask to modify my amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman has not done it yet.

Mr. WALSH. I assured the gentleman that I would make that request.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is sufficient. Then, I pass from that point to the third paragraph and the only remaining part of this section. While previously debating this subject of the appointment of a judge in a case where a man had served 10 years continuously and had passed the age of 70 years and yet held on to the office and its duties I stated that the question of the appointment of a judge who would be senior to him without removing him from his office was one which caused difference of opinion, and as the original act was framed, the one which was considered two years ago, it was objectionable, and I joined with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] in filing a minority report. The provisions of that act were drastic in the extreme and were not limited as they are in the section which is now before you for your consideration.

When we considered this bill in committee my colleague on the committee, to whom I referred, offered an amendment embodying the language that is now contained in this bill and by that amendment disarmed our objections and we agreed to pass the bill with this new provision as amended. Now, what is this amended provision? Is it constitutional?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. May I have just a couple of minutes more?

Mr. WEBB. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. This is a constitutional question, and it is hard to debate a constitutional question in two minutes, and I wish simply to advert to what the gentleman from Iowa said, that this portion of the bill was unconstitutional. The original bill was unconstitutional, but I think this is not, for the judge here is not deprived of his office, and, as my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] pointed out, it has been decided that as to his duties the legislative power to change or alter them is no violation of the constitutional provision that gives him tenure of office during good behavior, and during the course of debate I ventured the suggestion that possibly it might be construed that a man over 70 who had served 10 years continuously, who was incompetent to discharge the duties of his office by reason of physical or mental disability, but still maintained that position, might not be exercising "good behavior" in the office so as to be entitled to be considered as within the protection of the Constitution. But aside from that question there is no invasion of the constitutional protection, for all the power that is given to the President is to ascertain a state of facts, and when a state of facts is found showing that a man on the bench is incompetent to perform the functions—discharge the duties of his place—when that fact is found, the President may nominate a man, not a successor, but one to aid the community where this evil exists in getting rid of the evil consequences to business and to the administration of justice, and then that appointment must be confirmed by the Senate, and surely an outraged bar if this power were improperly used would reach the Senate and prevent the confirmation, and, if the confirmation is prevented, then what injury has been done? The man is vindicated and remains in his office, no harm is done, the successor fails of appointment, and the conditions are unchanged.

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman will yield, if the successor fails of appointment, does not the gentleman think some harm has been done to the man over whom one has been appointed?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. On the contrary, I think what might have been before a rumor or suggestion against him has been met in the open and defeated and shown not to be the truth and he is stronger than he was before, and surely there ought to be some remedy provided for an evil such as this which exists in a number of cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the assurance I gave the gentleman from Pennsylvania and members of the committee I ask to modify my motion according to the language which the Clerk has at the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modification, without objection.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WALSH moves to strike out lines 10 to 25, inclusive, on page 5, and lines 1 to 5, inclusive, on page 6.

Mr. WALSH. Now I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I was glad to yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Iowa, because I simply wish to state the reason why I shall vote for this amendment. It seems to me that aside from the question of constitutionality it is merely a question of balancing the advantages and disadvantages. It happens occasionally that a man attaining the age of 70 years, and with the right of retiring, is not willing to retire, although he is inefficient and incapable of performing his duties. Such an occurrence seems improbable, but we find from experience once in a while that is the case, and the question arises how to meet it. To-day we meet it by a bill in Congress, and when a judge will not retire, although he is incapable of performing his duties, Congress can easily authorize another judge, and it seems to me it is not putting the Nation to a great inconvenience to demand that.

Instead of that, this law provides that the President shall decide whether a man is inefficient or is not. The Executive is always subject to the temptation to appoint a new judge when it is not necessary. He is constantly besieged by Congressmen and others for appointments, and personally I think it is much wiser to leave the law as it is to-day, and compel Congress to authorize a new judge, than it is to subject the Executive of the United States to the pressure and temptation which I suspect might sometimes be yielded to of appointing a new judge when it is not really necessary, and imposing a slight upon the judge who is the senior by making him the junior. Inasmuch as I say a balance must be cast between the present system and this proposed system, it seems to me the balance of advantage is leaving the law as it is. I would rather leave the power with Congress than transfer it to the President. Therefore, I shall favor the striking out of this provision. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I believe the provision in question is a wise one, though I realize others disagree with me.

I think we must judge the future by the past. In a large number of instances judges who have had the opportunity to retire under existing law refused to do so. The amendment that we add in this bill to the retirement law I do not believe will change matters to any great extent. You can readily see why judges refuse to resign. When they resign they give up their power, their prominence, and importance in the district and, so to speak, become nobodies in the estimation of the public. They are not willing to do that, and they refuse to do it in almost every instance. Now, that has been our experience. When you come to Congress for relief politics often interferes and interminable delays occur; business piles up month after month and year after year, resulting in absolute denial of justice. That has been the situation.

This proposition is not to retire these judges arbitrarily. We do not ask anything of that kind. We realize that would be a violation of the Constitution. We simply say by this bill that when the Attorney General, or any one in the community where this judge lives, can satisfy the President that there is necessity for additional help, because the judge has become mentally or physically incapable of performing his duties, the President shall appoint additional help; but we provide that the old judge may remain on the bench and wear his honors until he dies. We humiliate nobody. All we are after is sufficient judges to perform the public service. That is all this section provides for; without it, justice must suffer. We ought not to deny justice; we ought not to continue a system such as the one we seek to remedy. The Attorney General has repeatedly appealed to us, time and time out of mind, for this relief. It can not be secured through Congress. It ought to be had, it seems to me, through an act such as this. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the general debate on this subject I called attention to what my views were and suggested a query as to whether the last section of the act was constitutional, and said that if I could find authority on the matter I would later present it.

I am happy to say that there is ample authority on the question as to what constitutes an office. The query I suggested to the committee then was this, that if a man holds his tenure by the Constitution, which says he shall hold during life or good behavior, could we by legislative enactment take away from this officer the right to exercise the functions of his office? I have no doubt at all, gentlemen, from the decided cases on this matter, that we can not do so by legislative enactment. The only way I think that the judge of the United States court, appointed by virtue of the Constitution and holding his tenure of office under constitutional limitation, can be removed is by constitutional change. The definition of an office is well set out in Machem on Public Offices and Officers. And it is stated to be this:

A public office is the right, authority, and duty, created and conferred by law, by which for a given period, either fixed by law or enduring at the pleasure of the creating power, an individual is invested with some portion of the sovereign functions of the Government, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public. The individual so invested is a public officer.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in a leading case on the subject, marked out what the term "office" meant as stated in our Constitution. And this is the digest of it:

An office is a public station, or employment, conferred by the appointment of the Government.

Now, this is what I want to call your attention to:

The term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties.

That was decided by Justice Swayne in the United States against Hartwell, in Sixth Wallace, United States Reports, on page 385.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; but my time is quite limited.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. How does the language of this bill deprive the incumbent of an office either of his term or of his official duties?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is that the question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is the question.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will answer that by saying that you do by indirection what you can not do by direction, in this way: You say you will not peremptorily enforce the withdrawal of this judge or force his resignation by law, but you will do this—you will have the President appoint in his district another judge, who is his senior and who can say to him whether he shall perform the duties of his office or not. And so the senior judge who is appointed deprives the other man of his office if he desires to do so, and deprives him of all right at all to perform the duties of his office. Can you imagine a judge holding his office who has no right to perform any part of the duties of his office?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Is not that true of every case in which there is a senior and a junior?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I say to you that you must govern your right to regulate whether a judge of the United States shall perform his office or not within constitutional inhibitions. You can not legislate a United States judge out of office whose term and tenure are fixed by the Constitution. You must do it by the Constitution, and here you are attempting to do something that you can not do by legislative enactment.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Do not you think we can pass a law abolishing a judicial district and thereby terminating the tenure of the judge?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No.

Mr. GORDON. Congress abolished 14 Federal judges that John Adams appointed.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. You can not abolish the office of judge by legislating away his district.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to see that authority.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It has been done in the case of Federal courts. You may abolish the courts, but you do not thereby abolish the judges. They still hold their offices. You can not deprive them of the right to hold their offices, and a part of the holding of such an office is the exercise of judicial duties.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. Does the gentleman think it would be unconstitutional to appoint an additional judge in a district where there is only one judge?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Not at all. That is what you ought to do in a district where the judge is incapacitated. What you want to do here is to put into the hands of the Executive the right to put this man out of office and deprive him of the right to perform the duties of his office by indirection.

Blackstone, the great expounder of the English common law, defined an office as "a right to exercise a public or private employment and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging." (2 Com., 36.) The Supreme Court of Maine, in Third Greenleaf, page 481, said that the term "office" "implies a delegation of a portion of the sovereign power to and the possession of it by the person filling the office." The Supreme Court of Illinois likewise held in Bunn against People (45 Ill., 397) that the conferring of an office involves a delegation to the individual of some of the sovereign functions of government to be exercised by him. The case I have heretofore cited, United States against Hartwell, was followed and approved in United States against Germaine, in the Ninety-ninth United States Reports, page 511, and Auffinordt against Hedden (137 U. S., 327).

It is evident, therefore, that the right to hold an office includes the right to exercise the duties of it. The legislative authority may limit the duties by restricting the size of the district or limiting the jurisdiction to a certain class of cases, but so long as the district continues you can not by legislation prevent the judge from exercising the duties of his office. And this bill does that. It says that on the making of a certain finding by the President another judge may be appointed, who shall be the senior judge, and shall prescribe what if any duties the original judge shall perform; if the senior judge wills that he do nothing, he can do nothing. He has a district and he is a judge, his tenure is fixed by the Constitution as for life or good behavior, and yet he can not perform a single function of his office except to draw his salary. What a travesty this is. By it you would emasculate the judicial office when held by a judge of over 70.

In Thomas against Owens (4 Md., 189), it was said that where the constitution has prescribed the qualifications, the possession of which shall entitle an individual to hold office under the State, it is not within the power of the legislature to change or add to them unless such power be given to the legislature either in express terms or by necessary implication. It was also held in a well-considered case in Ohio—State against Brewster (44 Ohio St., 589), that where the term of the officer is fixed by the constitution the legislature can neither extend nor abridge it. In Commonwealth against Gamble (62 Pa. St., 343), it was said that where the tenure and term of office are fixed by the Constitution, such provisions as the Constitution make are beyond the power of the legislature to alter or destroy.

There can be no doubt about this. If a district or circuit judge is guilty of misbehavior he can be impeached, otherwise he holds his office with the right to enjoy it for life. If a change in this system is desirable then the change must be a constitutional one.

And beyond the constitutional question is the equally important one presented by this bill: Is it good public policy to give to the Chief Executive the right to pass upon the capacity and usefulness of a Federal judge after he arrives at the age of 70 years? By an ex parte proceeding the President may, if this bill becomes the law, find any judge who has been on the bench 10 years and is over 70 incapable. The judge can not be heard at this proceeding—he has no right of appeal. The finding may be political, it may even be malicious, but there is no recourse. Over the head of every Federal judge who comes within the purview of this bill there will hang the constant sword of an Executive order condemning him as a man further unfit for respectable service to the country. He lives and serves with the constant knowledge that his tenure of office is at the behest and by the grace of the Executive, and that by the stroke of his pen a political Executive may shatter his usefulness and send him dishonored to seclusion and disgrace. Should such a power be given to the executive branch of our Government to thus control indirectly the courts of the country, and, by its misuse, to perhaps influence the decisions of our courts of justice? I can not believe it. It is not enough to say that such abuses would not occur. They might occur and that is sufficient reason why this provision of this bill should not be the law.

I am entirely willing to vote for a reasonable increase in the salaries of the judges of our Federal courts; I would vote for the provision increasing their salaries to $7,500 a year. But if, in order to do so, I must vote for this last provision of the bill giving the Executive power over our judges I shall not vote for the bill at all. I can not bring my mind to consent to a provision that is so altogether vicious and dangerous.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, we have one more speaker on this side.

Mr. WALSH. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. WEBB. No; there will be two short ones on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have serious doubt of the constitutionality of this provision, but aside from the constitutionality of it I have very grave fears in regard to the construction that may be placed upon the language used in the section.

This section provides that the President, if he finds that any judge is unable to discharge efficiently any of the duties of his office by reason of his mental or physical disabilities, may when necessary appoint another judge, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I fear that the Senate will place this construction upon that, that the question of finding the physical or mental disability of the judge is one exclusively for the President, and that the Senate, in considering the confirmation of the newly appointed judge, must be confined to the sole question of his qualifications for the office.

Now, if the Senate places that construction upon this language of the bill, then the Senate will only enter into the question of the qualifications of the new judge appointed, leaving the question of finding as to the mental or physical disability of the acting judge exclusively to the President. I think the language in the bill clearly implies that that will be done.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. As I understand it, these hearings as to the disability of the judge will be ex parte, from which the judge has no right of appeal to any tribunal?

Mr. DENISON. Certainly. I think that under this bill it will be exclusively the privilege of the President to make the finding as to the disability of the acting judge. He can do it in any way he wants to; and when he makes a finding satisfactory to himself he will simply send in the nomination of another judge for that district and the Senate will simply have the right to consider the qualifications of the new judge and not the disqualifications of the old judge. The bill in its present form gives no one the right to review or question the finding of the President. If that should be the construction of the provision by the Senate—and I think it will be—then you can see the danger that lies in this provision of the bill.

In the next place, gentlemen, if the Senate should not give it that construction, and if the Senate should hold that they would have the right in considering the new appointment to consider the disqualifications of the old judge, then whenever the Senate would enter into that inquiry and find differently from the President, finding, for instance, that the old judge was not disqualified, the appointment of the new judge would not be confirmed. Now, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if that would not be a grave injustice to the new judge, because he would then stand before the courts and the bar and before the whole country as discredited, as unconfirmed by the Senate after the President had nominated him for the office?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Replying to your question, is it not a fact that whether or not the appointment is appropriately made is one for review by the Senate? For instance, if the President appointed a man judge of a district where there was no vacancy would not the Senate have the right to consider that and say there is no vacancy and refuse to confirm, and if he made the appointment in a place where the judge was not incompetent would not the Senate have the right to say that the judge is not incompetent?

Mr. DENISON. I think not, under the language used in the bill. The gentleman knows, as we all know, that when the President appoints a judge and the Senate refuses to confirm him it is because of some disqualification of the man appointed. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be appointed by the President to a judicial position where the President had concluded that an acting judge was disqualified, and the Senate should refuse to confirm the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I say it would be a grave reflection on the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and a great injustice to him, and it would be so considered all over the country. I think that is very undesirable. On the other hand, when the Senate should find that the acting judge is disqualified, does anyone think that that judge could continue to perform his duties? There would be an adjudication that he is mentally unfit or physically unfit, and he would have had no chance whatever for a hearing. I say that would be a great injustice to the acting judge. So whatever view the Senate might take of its duty under this law, there is bound to be a great injustice to one or the other, or both. [Applause.]

The fact is, if this bill becomes a law, every Federal judge who has served 10 years and has reached the age of 70 years will feel that his mental and physical condition is under the scrutiny of the President. He will know that there are many able men about him wanting his place. He will be bound to feel under constraint, or intimidation, or under a fear that without his knowledge he may be found by the President to be disqualified in some way and another judge appointed. The natural result would be to coerce or constrain the judge to retire. Such a law will strike at the independence of the judiciary and have the effect of doing indirectly what we can not do directly, and for these reasons I think this section of the bill should be stricken out.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. WEBB. And I have eight minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has eight minutes.

Mr. WEBB. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, there are three things guaranteed in the Constitution to one who holds a judicial position, and not one of the three is infringed by the language that the gentleman seeks to strike out. The things that the Constitution holds firmly for are the term, the duties of the office, and the salary.

There are, fortunately, only a few isolated cases where one who has occupied a position on the Federal bench does not realize his own limitations. He does not realize that with the encroachment of years or from disease he has become inefficient and incapacitated to perform the duties for which he was appointed. I am of those who believe that a man on the bench, or whatever capacity in public life, ought to be prepared at all times to do the work, and ought to be efficient and have capacity to do the work. But when a man on the Federal bench has no longer capacity, either by physical or mental impairment, there should be somebody on the bench to do the work, because the position of judge is not a sinecure created for the individual; it is a position for the adjudication of differences between the people in his district. It is necessary to have some one capable of adjusting the differences and act on the points of law brought out before him. Therefore the section provides that if one is permanently incapacitated by physical or mental disability, then the President of the United States first must affirmatively find that, and, second, he may appoint a temporary judge, because that is all it is, to do the work. This is simply to give assistance to disabled judges, which I believe is entirely within the purview of the Constitution, because there is no impairment of a single right of this incapacitated judge. He may still resign, he may still retire, and he has all the rights he can have except the right of a physically and mentally impaired man to pass on the public business brought in the court. Therefore I view it entirely within the Constitution and to be within the public policy which keeps these men in the judicial position of the highest standard of service. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, while I am in favor of increasing the salary of Federal judges and shall vote for the bill in any event, yet I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts will prevail. As I understand, it strikes out the second and third paragraphs of section 3, which provides that if any judge is unable to discharge efficiently all the duties of his office by reason of mental or physical disability of a permanent character the Executive may appoint an additional judge.

That is a tremendous power to be conferred on the Executive. It rests with him to determine as a question of fact whether the existing judge is mentally or physically disabled. Assume that the President should determine that a judge was suffering from mental disability, I do not know exactly what that phrase means, but I assume mental aberration. If that fact should be found, it seems to me it follows that such a judge would not be in a mental condition to try cases. I would not want to try a case before a judge suffering from mental disability or have a judge suffering from mental disability decide a case for my client. Further down in the paragraph it provides:

> And the judge so entitled to resign or retire shall be held and treated as if junior in commission to the remaining judges of said court, who shall, in the order of the seniority of their respective commissions, exercise such powers and perform such duties as by law may be incident to seniority.

Now, it is apparent that if a judge is suffering from mental disability the only remedy which you can apply to him is to retire him and put a sane judge in his place. In addition to that, this paragraph, in my judgement, is a partisan paragraph. It might have some weight in causing a Federal judge to be subservient to the Executive, to have some fear that the Executive might displace him. I say that is an autocratic power that we ought not to confer upon anybody.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have four minutes. I want to ask my friend, How are you going to retire one of those mentally disqualified judges? We are supposing a case where he will not retire, and he can not work, and you will not let us put in a judge to help him.

Mr. MAGEE. I will answer the gentleman's question if I may be permitted to do so. It was stated here on the floor yesterday, especially by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, that time and again an act has been passed relieving such a condition where it existed.

Mr. WEBB. That is, at the request of the judge. I helped to do that in the case of Judge Moody.

Mr. MAGEE. If such a condition arises, the House can remedy it; but I say we should not put it in the power of anybody to humiliate a Federal judge.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose there is anybody in this House who is any more careful of the dignity and rights of the judges than I am. I know we all feel that way, and I do not know of any Member of the House who is any more careful about the dignity and the prerogatives of the judges than are the judges themselves, and this provision of this bill is indorsed by the Federal judges of the United States because the great majority of them know that there are a few instances of two classes. One is where men have been on the bench until they are so old that they can not do the work. I had a case brought to my attention the other day. A lawyer presented to a judge a draft of an order and the judge said the lawyer would have to fix it up in another way. The lawyer acted on the suggestion of the judge and framed the order as the judge had suggested. Then he took it back to the judge and the old man did not remember anything about the order at all. Now you can not impeach a man of that kind. He has not committed any crime. There are two classes of cases. One of them is that of an honest old judge who wants to stay in office and fight it out. In nine cases out of ten he will request the President to appoint a relief judge. The other case is that of old, effete, worn-out men who do not know just exactly what they are doing. You hate to impeach them, they will not retire, and they can not work.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. WEBB. I have only two minutes left. If I have the time, I will be glad to yield to my friend. I say that the judges themselves think this is a wise provision, because they indorse it. I do not suppose there is any man in America of higher judicial character and honor than Charles E. Hughes, and he wrote a letter saying this is a wise provision.

Gentlemen think somebody is going to commit a crime, that somebody is going to reflect on the integrity of a judge or going to take his office away from him. I challenge anybody to show where this provision takes any power away from a judge. It just simply gives the new and younger man, whether appointed by a Republican or a Democratic President, the power to get to the front and do the hardest work. The old judge remains in office until he wants to retire or until he dies. There is no taking away of his rights, there is no reflection on him. Ordinarily, I expect the new judge will be appointed at the request of the old judge, who will say, "I can not do the work, and I will be glad to have the help of a younger man until I die or retire." I had a judge who was 74 years old tell me, "I want to die in harness, but I can not do the heavy work of this district. I should like to have an additional judge." And I imagine that judge would write to the President and ask him to give him an additional judge to help him out. I hope this paragraph will not be stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question being taken, Mr. WALSH demanded a division.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 57, noes 98.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 6, after the word "death," strike out the word "or" and insert, after the word "resignation," the words "or retirement"; and make the same amendment in line 9; and strike out after the word "filled" in line 10 the balance of the section.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I think that amendment is all right, and I thank the gentleman for suggesting it. It makes the meaning of the section clearer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. BORLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12001 and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. WALSH rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WALSH. To offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WALSH moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report the same forthwith, with an amendment striking out all of the matter embraced between line 10, on page 5, and line 5, on page 6, inclusive.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, this motion to recommit includes the amendment which was offered in the Committee of the Whole——

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, is this matter debatable?

Mr. WALSH. It is, if I am recognized.

Mr. WEBB. I move the previous question.

Mr. WALSH. I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. WALSH. It simply provides for striking out of the bill that section which gives the President opportunity upon a finding of facts——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. My understanding is that the rule providing for the consideration of this bill provides that the previous question shall be ordered. If the previous question was ordered, then I submit under the rules of the House a motion to recommit is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered under the rule, the debate is not in order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the previous question was ordered on the bill, but not on the motion to recommit. There is nothing in the rule which provides that the previous question shall be ordered on the motion to recommit, but I submit to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that the previous question shall be ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-eight Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 113, nays 168, answered "present" 3, not voting 149, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, and he answered "Present."

The SPEAKER. By inadvertence House bill 13355, for the relief of the St. Croix Chippewa Indians in Wisconsin, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, when it ought to have been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Without objection, it will be rereferred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, December 14, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, December 14, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the entering in of Thy law giveth life, and in the midst of the unsolved problems of this day we seek to conform our lives, our thinking, and all that we do to the law of God, that there may be light along the pathway which leads us to the realization of the great ideals for which we stand as a Nation. Guide us this day in the discharge of our duties. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday, December 12, 1918, when, on request of Mr. VARDAMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—HOG ISLAND SHIPPING PLANT.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. My attention has been called to a special dispatch from Philadelphia, Pa., published in the Washington Post of yesterday, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, December 13.

The lie direct has been given to Senator VARDAMAN, of Mississippi, by Rear Admiral Francis T. Bowles, assistant general manager of the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Senator VARDAMAN in the Senate on Tuesday said the construction of the Hog Island shipyard was "one of the most infamous transactions that mar the pages of American history." He agreed, he said, with Senator KING, of Utah, who had declared "there was a great deal of vulgar robbery, stealing, and thievery by men engaged in the Hog Island enterprise."

Senator VARDAMAN said he thought there was enough evidence in the hands of the Senate Committee of Commerce to justify cancellation of the contract made with the company that constructed the Hog Island shipyard.

Admiral Bowles's heated retort to these charges was in a telegram to Senator FLETCHER, chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce. The message follows:

"You and your committee will appreciate that this statement that the contract for the construction of Hog Island shipyard and building of ships there is an infamous transaction reflects upon all parties to it, and therefore particularly upon Admiral Capps and myself. Senator VARDAMAN has had every opportunity to know the truth, and he knows that his statement is a deliberate lie.

"At a time when every effort is being made by myself and the administration of the shipyard to organize to the best advantage a large force of men for the construction of vessels, such statements are detrimental to the interests of the United States and a gross injustice to every man connected with this enterprise."

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, years ago I would have experienced an unholy delight in taking satisfaction on the carcass of the self-convicted conscienceless slanderer who uttered that telegram. But I have passed that stage in moral growth. I have come to the conclusion that nothing is proven by physical combat except the superiority of brute force and the determination of that fact is hardly worth while.

Now, what I said about the Hog Island enterprise was uttered upon the floor of this Chamber as a United States Senator under the sanctity of an oath to uphold the Constitution, the laws of the country, and protect the interests of the American people against the greed, cupidity, avarice, and criminality of the outlaws of society. I was discussing a public enterprise and one which I know and everybody else knows is as far from being faultless as sin is far from virtue. It is an enterprise that no honest man could defend in all of its details. It is one of these peculiar enterprises that have grown up since the declaration of war, which was conceived by its promoters in private life in the sin of selfishness and brought forth swaddled in the American flag to serve a selfish purpose.

Let us for a moment consider its history. A number of highly respectable financiers came together, formed a corporation, bought a hog wallow, which was rightly named "Hog Island," capitalized it at probably double or treble its real value, and then leased it to the United States for a site for a shipbuilding plant. The land was valued at $1,700,000, and the rent charged the Government of the United States was 6 per cent on estimated value of the land, if my memory serves me correctly. This same corporation undertook and agreed to build, the Government of the United States paying all expenses, this shipbuilding plant at an estimated cost of $21,000,000 without fees or plus per cent.

The profits which the shipbuilding corporation was to receive as a commission for the patriotic service to be rendered by it was 4 or 5 per cent on the value of the ships to be built by this plant. The work in the construction of the plant had not proceeded very far, however, before it was determined by the corporation, which we are told was organized for patriotic purposes, that the building might be facilitated by subletting contracts at a fixed fee of 5 per cent upon the estimated cost of the work.

Some of the contractors, it appeared from the testimony, had stock in the parent corporation with which the Government contracted to build the plant without fees. Everyone knows, who has paid any attention to the investigation of this enterprise, that in the beginning of the building of the plant the grossest extravagance in the payment of wages, the most glaring incompetency was shown in the purchase of material, and in the general management of the company. Every man called to the service of this corporation had his wages doubled and, in some instances, quadrupled. The head man, who had been the directing head of the contracting firm of Stone & Webster, who received from Stone & Webster $12,000 per year while serving them, was put at the head of the shipbuilding corporation with a salary of $25,000 per year. For everything that was done of a similar nature the United States Government was charged and plundered accordingly.

It will also be remembered that when this corporation undertook the construction of the Hog Island shipping plant it tried to induce the Government to fix its commission for the work it was to perform at 10 per cent, but it was finally forced down to, I think, 5 per cent. When asked by members of the committee to state what the constructing corporation had done or was to do to justify it in asking the Government to pay it 5 per cent on the ships to be built in the Hog Island yard, we were told that it was the "know how" which they were furnishing the Government; and, Mr. President, I want to say just here that, after looking over the matter carefully, I am within the bounds of conservatism when I say that there was not a member of that corporation who knew any more about shipbuilding than the Democratic emblem does about the nebular hypothesis or a prairie dog knows about the political economy of the planet Mars. It was just a piece of graft, pure and simple, but they justified their extraordinary demand by saying that, if the members of the corporation did not themselves know anything about shipbuilding, the corporation furnished the Government of the United States men who did know how. With the salaries that were paid the men, certainly the United States Government did not need this corporation to act as its labor agent in securing capable men to do Government work, especially when you consider the fact that the Government paid twice and three times as much for their services as they could have gotten from private employers in the labor markets of the country.

I want the United States Government to deal fairly and justly with its citizens, but I think that every dollar the Government pays to this corporation as commission on ships built by the shipbuilding plant at Hog Island will be nothing less then robbery of the Public Treasury.

Mr. President, I was about to overlook the fact that the plant which these patriots for pelf were to construct at an estimated cost of $21,000,000, I am told, has cost over $60,000,000; and I think it has completed but one ship. Of course, I want to be fair with them. I am sure they have a good many ships on the ways. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to correct me if I am mistaken. I think the corporation has completed but one ship. Am I correct about that?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think, Mr. President, there has been one ship delivered, accepted, and put in service; but there are other ships, I do not know how many more, that are launched. I understand that there are other ships on the ways; in fact, a ship under construction on each of the 50 ways.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand there are a great many on the ways.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, as to the one ship to which the Senator refers, is it not that particular ship which subsequently had difficulty in floating and had to be reriveted?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I can not answer the Senator about that. I hope to get those facts later, but if it does not float it will be in keeping with pretty nearly everything they have done since the plant was begun.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not of my own knowledge say there was difficulty in regard to its floating; but it is the first that was launched there, and it might be expected that there was further work to do on it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Was it required to be reriveted?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know about what work was required after it was launched. Possibly there was some reriveting or additional riveting to be done, but it is actually in service. It has been received, accepted, delivered, and inspected and given a satisfactory classification by both Lloyd's and the American Bureau of Shipping.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The building of one ship is a great work. Will the Senator state how much Government money has been spent up to date?

Mr. FLETCHER. How much on the yard and in construction?

Mr. VARDAMAN. How much has been squandered on the Hog Island enterprise?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not concede that anything has been squandered there. I think the Hog Island plant itself has cost more money than was expected.

Mr. VARDAMAN. How much more?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator will find the statement on page 10 of our hearings. Mr. Piez says:

> Mr. PIEZ. The original estimate, which was a very hastily prepared one and on a basis of plans that were subsequently materially modified, was $21,000,000. Then we gave them the contract for a second type of ship, Senator, that we know as class B, a troop ship of 15 or 16 knots speed. Their estimate after they got that, recognizing the additional complications in making two types of ships instead of one, was that the yards would cost about $27,000,000 or $28,000,000. I think the most recent estimate was $58,000,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is it not a matter of fact that it has cost over $60,000,000 up to date. But that is a small matter, Mr. President, that the public——

Mr. FLETCHER. That is possible as to the entire yard and equipment; but the Senator will remember that the yard finished and completed is quite different from the yard which was originally contemplated.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Probably so; but I am surprised that such high-priced know howism should be so unreliable.

Mr. FLETCHER. It has been added to immensely, and material changes have been made in their equipment—cranes, warehouses, railroads, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I would not under the circumstances deal unfairly with them. I am willing to concede that there are a great many ships on the way, and in the course of time they will be completed. I do not want to do this corporation an injustice. I hardly think from the impression I have from the hearings that I should have to borrow from the vocabulary of my friend the versatile Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and one or two other Senators in order to have a vocabulary sufficientiy full to describe all the failures and to characterize the failures they have made and the infamy of the transaction of which they are guilty.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, with reference to the matter of delivering ships, I do not question the statement of the chairman of the committee; he may have much more reliable information than I have; but I want to say to the Senator that three or four days ago a very reliable gentleman told me, as a matter of fact, that the ship has not yet been delivered.

Mr. FLETCHER. The gentleman is altogether mistaken. I have it from Mr. Rossiter, I have it from Mr. Piez, and I have it from half a dozen sources that that ship has been accepted and delivered.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I hope the Senator will pardon me. I will concede that they have made one ship.

Mr. FLETCHER. They have made more than one, but they have delivered one. They have launched a number of others, and there are fifty on the ways. If all the rivets that have been driven into the 50 ships had been concentrated into 10 ships, you would have had 10 ships completed before now. They have driven rivets enough to complete practically their program, but they extended the work over 50 ships instead of confining it to a smaller number, and the contractor was ordered to proceed that way.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If they are building ships, in the language of Robert Burns—in plowman's phrase—God send them speed. I do not want to misrepresent them.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am sure the Senator does not, and I am simply trying to help him in that direction by stating the facts; that is all.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator is very kind. I want to say, Mr. President, that the time has come when this robbery of the Government in the name of patriotism should be stopped; really it should never have been begun.

I remember when the president of this corporation came before this committee. He made the most glorious promises. He said, "We want to build the ships; we want to win the war; send us to the penitentiary after we win the war; but let us build ships." Of course, the fact that 4 or 5 per cent was paid them upon the value of every ship constructed had nothing to do with that burst of patriotism on his part.

There are some people in this country who seem to regard it as their God-given privilege, belonging exclusively to them, to wrap their well-fed carcasses in the American flag, and, with the words of patriotism upon their flyblown, impious lips, go over the country denouncing everybody who dares question their right to continue this nefarious business. I, for one, shall continue to denounce it and to call attention to it. As soon as I can get hold of the report of the Department of Justice which deals with this question and can again go over more carefully the investigations of the Commerce Committee I shall have more to say on the subject. In the meantime I hope the Commerce Committee will go further in the matter and make a report of the results of its investigation. Let the pitiless sunlight of publicity shine in upon the dark and devious ways of these patriots for perquisites. Let every other enterprise which is tainted with fraud undergo similar investigation. It is more necessary that the Republic shall be preserved and the people saved from plunder than that the delicate feelings of these dollar-hearted, sordid-souled sinners shall be respected.

I repeat, Mr. President, the Hog Island enterprise is a disgrace to the administration. It is an affront to every man who wore a uniform at home or gave his life for his country in the trenches of France. It is an outrage upon the toiling taxpayers of the land.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to present the certificate of election of Senator Elect TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY, which I ask to have read and filed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the certificate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I move that this commission be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves that the certificate be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask that the usual course be taken with this certificate and that it be filed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I rise to an inquiry. All the previous credentials that I have noted when I have been in the Chamber have been ordered by the Chair to lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have been ordered to be placed on file.

Mr. PENROSE. That is the same thing, I suppose, and I am at a loss to understand why an exception should be made in this particular case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not responsible for the motion.

Mr. PENROSE. But I rose to an inquiry, Mr. President, of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not want to renew the discussion which took place here some weeks ago. I am satisfied that this matter will have to be investigated; and I believe that it should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The record already shows the expense account in this case, and it shows, in my judgment—and I do not intend to prejudge when I make this statement—that the person whose commission comes here had knowledge of the fact that these expenditures were being made.

Other matters have been called to my attention, and I think it is due to the gentleman whose commission is now presented that there shall be an investigation, whether at this session or later I do not know, but that is a matter which will be determined later, I dare say. For the present, however, I insist that this commission shall go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. LODGE. That is a debatable question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am not objecting at this time to any investigation as to the election of this elected candidate, but there is now nothing for the Senate to do, it seems to me, but to place this certificate on file. This Congress has nothing to do with this man taking his seat. The next Congress will have full power to act, and can act as it sees fit. I do not wish anything concealed; I know of nothing that can be concealed; but I simply ask that this certificate, which is in proper form, shall take the usual course and be placed on file. When the proper time comes it may be considered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, not to repeat what was said on a former day, perhaps of the last session, it has come to my knowledge that a movement was on foot in the State of Michigan for a recount in this case. An investigation, which has been made, results in the conclusion that under the law of the State of Michigan, as it has been construed by the supreme court of that State, there can be no recount. The statutes of the State of Michigan provide, so I am informed, that after an election and the counting of the vote, the ballots are returned to the ballot boxes and sealed up, and they are there to remain until the next general election. The next general election in Michigan takes place early in April, so I am informed. Then these ballots are to be destroyed.

I have also been advised that in one precinct in Michigan it has already been discovered that 103 votes which ought to have been counted were not counted for one of the other candidates; that in another precinct 25 votes have not been counted; that in another between 40 and 50 votes have not been counted; and in a fourth that between 50 and 60 votes have not been counted. I am not saying that this is a fact, but I am saying that the facts are such as to justify this Senate in taking some action which may result in doing justice as between the candidates, and to the Senate itself as well.

I may have some information on the subject to present at a later day, but I am simply, in very general terms, indicating to the Senate what it is said will be developed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator's statement shows how unreliable his information must be. There has been no opportunity for a recount, and there could be no possible determination at this time of the question whether or not votes have been counted. That is a question, however, which will be perfectly open. There will be no ballots destroyed. The only body that has a right to recount is the Senate when this man, whose certificate of election has been presented, has been sworn in. At that time the Senate will have an opportunity to contest the election, if it sees fit, the same as the House has in the case of Members of that body, and the facts can all be secured. But there is nothing that this Senate at this time can do. All that the Senator's committee attempted to do before was to investigate the primary election, with a view of passing legislation controlling elections and primaries. These credentials are correct. If they are not correct, I submit that that is a question which the Senate can determine. This man's credentials are here for filing; they should be filed; and then, if there is any question as to the legality of his election, when he comes to take his seat that question can be investigated, and there is provision for such action made by the Senate itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this seems to me an effort to do by indirection what the Senate declined to do directly. This certificate is correct in form, and its authenticity is not questioned. The Senate refused, rightly as I think, in the case of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] to discuss the right to a seat over which they had no possible jurisdiction. This Senate has no possible jurisdiction of any kind over this seat from Michigan. That can only belong to the next Senate. The credentials offered are regular, authentic, and in proper form; and it seems to me there can be properly no discrimination in the treatment accorded between this and other credentials which have been filed without objection. If, Mr. President, this treatment can be imposed upon these credentials, then it can be imposed upon every one of the other credentials that are here on file. It would open the door, in my judgment, to a very unfortunate situation and would contradict all of the unbroken precedents of the Senate, including the precedent that was established only the other day by direct vote. I trust that the Senate will not at this time undertake to assume jurisdiction of a case to which this Senate can have no possible relation and over which it has no power.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am somewhat interested in the position taken by eminent Senators upon the other side of this Chamber regarding the nature of the Senate. I recall two or three years ago some of us whose terms of service were quite recent insisted that the rules of the Senate, like the calendar and the pending unfinished business, should expire with the Congress of which that Senate was a part. We were told by Senators who had been here for many years that not only was the Senate a continuous body, but the intimation was very strong that whoever denied it did so at the expense of his intelligence. At any rate, it was impossible for us to secure any consideration of the rules upon the theory that succeeding Senates were independent of each other. I recall that in one instance I was referred by my very good friend, the then Senator from New York, Mr. Root, to the statesmen of the past—Clay, Webster, Benton, and others—for information regarding the continuous character of the Senate. I availed myself of that suggestion to investigate the subject, and found that the references were correct. Now we are told that a certificate of election of a Senator whose term is to begin on the 4th of next March is not a subject for consideration by this Senate, but by the Senate of the next Congress; that is to say, by a different Senate; that is to say, that the Senate is continuous for some purposes but not continuous for others; that is to say, that it is largely a matter of political convenience whether the Senate shall be considered as continuous or noncontinuous.

Now, without regard to the propriety or the impropriety of referring this certificate to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I think that it is a good time to emphasize the proposition that this is either a continuous body or it is not. It certainly can not be continuous for one purpose and noncontinuous for another; continuous for some matters of immediate importance and noncontinuous for other matters of immediate importance.

Mr. President, I have also made very slight investigation of the precedents regarding this subject, and I find that the history of the Senate is quite replete with instances, particularly immediately after the Civil War and during the period of reconstruction, when certificates of election, regular in form, were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and where many of those holding such certificates never did succeed in securing seats in the Senate. Of course, it may be said that times then were "out of joint," but it may be said now also that times are "out of joint."

I know nothing, Mr. President, of a personal nature regarding the expenditure of money in the State of Michigan, but I know something about the expenditure of money in my own State through the official reports which have recently been filed, and these justify the effort which I made in the Committee on Finance, and which I shall here renew, to place a tax of 100 per cent as a part of the income tax on every patriot who is so benevolent or generous as to subscribe more than $500 to each campaign.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I had not supposed that there would be the slightest question as to this certificate taking the usual course; but inasmuch as the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections desires that it be used to establish a precedent in the Senate, I am going to withdraw the certificate at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the withdrawal of the certificate?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I happen to be a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I do not think the impression which is prevailing here to the effect that the chairman of the committee [Mr. POMERENE] is establishing a precedent is correct. I have not had time to examine the question particularly, but I remember that when the credentials of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] were presented the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections at that time objected and asked that they be referred, as, indeed, they were referred, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, although those credentials were regular on their face and in proper form. It seemed that there was some dispute as to the authority of the Oregon Legislature, and the credentials were referred, and, so far as I know, properly referred, although I was not a Member of the Senate at that time. Now, whether the credentials should be withdrawn at this time and presented at a later day will make no difference. There is going to be no disposition to prejudge the alleged election of Mr. NEWBERRY; but Senators, if any there be, who imagine that they may escape the duty of investigating these large expenditures are chasing a rainbow. The account as filed showed an expenditure of $176,000 in the primary election alone in Mr. NEWBERRY's behalf. The question which has been before us for a long time will again be presented, to wit, Is this Senate going to seat men who come here with soiled and stained credentials and present such credentials at that bar?

The Senator from Colorado spoke of an "election" in Colorado. Why, they had no election there. They had an auction. An election for Senator in Colorado! It was an auction, and we are not going to escape the duty of investigating these questions. The day is coming—it is almost here—when a poor man does not dare offer himself as a candidate for the Senate unless he is backed by some millionaire's club. It is our duty to investigate these conditions, and if the Colorado Senators sit supinely here and fail to call for an investigation I shall have no sympathy for any situation that may arise in their State.

I hope the chairman will insist on his motion that these credentials be referred to the committee, as I believe has been the uniform custom when a charge of this sort has been made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request?

Mr. ASHURST. Why, yes; I object.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States provides:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

A certificate has just been presented to the Senate in regular form, authenticated by the proper officials of a State, certifying that a certain gentleman has been duly elected a Senator of the United States, to take his office on the 4th day of next March, and to serve as a Senator in this body for six years from that time. Under the Constitution, it seems to me that the Senate will be the judge of the qualifications and the election and the returns of that Senator when he gets here, if they are called in question. If I recall substantially the provision of the corrupt-practices act, inhibiting the expenditure of more than a certain amount of money in a campaign for the office of Senator, it provides that if the Senator violates the provisions of the act, or if they are violated by others in his behalf, with his knowledge and consent, the office shall be declared vacant.

Mr. President, I fail to see the relevancy of the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado as to the Senate being a continuing body. I believe that it is a continuing body.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. My own opinion is that the Senate is not a continuing body, except in a very peculiar sense. I simply gave what seemed to be the consensus of opinion here on one or two occasions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not mean at all to intimate that the Senator believed it to be a continuing body. I say, I think his suggestion in relation to that subject is irrelevant to the case in question. I believe the Senate to be a continuing body, thereby differing from the Senator from Colorado. I believe it to be a continuing body, as a body one-third of the membership of which changes every two years.

Without, however, discussing that question, this gentleman whose certificate has just been tendered here does not pretend or claim to be a Member of this body now. In point of fact, the certificate which has just been tendered here, if tendered on the 4th day of next March, would be subject to the same motion and subject in all respects to the same conditions as it is now, except that now it seems to me that this Senate has nothing to do about the qualifications of the Senator elect. He is not a Senator yet. He is a private citizen. How is this body to be the judge of the qualifications of one of its Members who has not yet qualified as a Member?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The argument about the continuing nature of the Senate related to the rules. The rules exist in this Senate. Mr. NEWBERRY does not exist as a Senator in this Senate, and you can not continue him, because he does not exist here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. After the Senator elect has become a Member of this body, Mr. President, by taking the oath of office, if he has violated or if in his election the provisions of the secret-ballot law, or the corrupt-practices act, or whatever the official name of that act may be, have been violated, the remedy is in the hands of the Senate. Nothing is lost; nothing can be lost; nothing is waived; no advantage is achieved by anybody in receiving and placing on file a communication from the proper authorities of the sovereign State of Michigan. If it is found later on that the asseverations contained in the certificate are not true, and that Mr. NEWBERRY was not duly elected a Member of this body, he will be unseated; but to say now that before he becomes a Member of the body the Senate would proceed, through its authorized Committee on Privileges and Elections, to conduct an elaborate investigation, going into the facts and taking all the testimony in relation not only to his election to his office, or his alleged election, but to the primary in his State for the nomination for the office, seems to me to be going far afield, and contending for a construction of the Constitution which has never, to my knowledge, been asserted previously.

It seems to me that the regular order in this case, as in all similar cases, is to place the credentials on file; and if anybody rises in his place here upon petitions requesting such action, or upon information and belief, or for any reason satisfactory to himself, and makes charges or establishes a prima facie case that will convince the Senate that it ought to conduct an investigation into the circumstances of this election, if the Senate believes it should it will so vote. But to start in now, with neither the candidate nor the evidence nor the charges, if there are any, before us or within the jurisdiction of this body, seems to me to be utterly premature and utterly irregular, and would result in the establishment of a precedent which I am sure would come home to plague us in the future, and would put every Senator who runs for reelection in the future in the position of having to meet and defend the title to his office before he had qualified for it, and would be an encouragement to everybody—his enemies politically and those in his own party who were disappointed by his nomination—in some way or other, without asserting responsible charges, to subject that Senator to the defense of a suit before he had arrived to claim the office to which his State authorities had asserted he had been duly elected.

So, inasmuch as neither the dignity nor the rights of the Senate can be in any way waived or affected by receiving these credentials in the customary manner and placing them on file, and inasmuch as the whole subject is still open to complete investigation afterwards, I hope that the motion of the Senator from Ohio to commit this certificate to the Committee on Privileges and Elections will not prevail.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the plain provision of the Constitution, section 5, is that—

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

The Senate proceeds in this sort of a case through its Committee on Privileges and Elections. A certificate is presented here. The person certified to be elected may not have been elected; the person certified to be qualified may not be qualified within the judgment of this body. This Senate is to determine that question; and it proceeds to determine it first by having the certificate, which is the evidence submitted, referred to its committee for examination and for such investigation as that committee feels ought to be given the subject.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me clearly a question that comes now, at the very threshhold, to determine whether this party who is certified to have been elected was really elected; whether this party who is certified to have been qualified was really qualified to hold this position. Those are matters which this body has jurisdiction to determine. Under the Constitution its duty is to determine those matters.

Now, surely I am not in error when I recall that when our friends on the other side were in the majority in this body the universal practice was to refer these certificates to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no; Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Florida is mistaken about that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know of any exception to that rule. When my credentials were presented here, the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections asked to have them go to that committee. I remember distinctly that the distinguished Senator from Michigan, Mr. Julius C. Burrows, was chairman of that committee, and he took possession of those credentials; and my recollection is that in every instance the credentials were turned over to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. If they found everything all regular and decided that the person certified to was qualified and was elected, and the returns were properly certified here, then they reported favorably, and the matter was closed in that way. That was the practice.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator what his recollection is about this matter: When the certificates of all the newly elected Senators—which is the regular order, as I understand—are referred in a mass, at the time when they are to take their seats, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the certificates are regular in form, does the Committee on Privileges and Elections at that time, without any question being raised as to their election and their qualifications, proceed to conduct an investigation to determine that fact?

Mr. FLETCHER. They would have authority to do that if that question was presented.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not ask the Senator that. Of course, they have authority to do it if the certificates are referred to the committee by the Senate for that purpose; but in cases where those credentials—as is generally done when Senators are elected—are referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the absence of charges or a question being raised as to their qualifications, is anything ever done except to report them favorably as being regular in form according to the blanks sent out by the Secretary of the Senate?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is correct; but, then, who is to say whether charges will be made or not? The indications are that charges have been made in this instance. I do not know precisely what form that has taken, but the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections tells the Senate that there are certain matters which the committee ought to consider in reporting upon this case.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

Mr. FLETCHER. How far they will reach we can not foretell, and we ought not to foreclose the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it will be impossible to foreclose the Senate, if the Senator will pardon me; and I do not want the assertion of the Senator to go unchallenged when he states, as I understand him to state, that there are charges pending. Where are they, and who makes them?

Mr. FLETCHER. I say the indications are that there will be charges.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, I see no indications——

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The indications are that they are going to try to get some, perhaps; but I know of no indication that there are charges pending. The chairman of the committee certainly has not made any such charges.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, if there are no charges made, then the committee has nothing to pass upon. There could not very well be any charges made, as a Senator suggests, until the matter is before the body that can consider the charges.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire whether my memory serves me right, and the memory of some other Senators, that in 1913 the Vice President, by general order, referred all certificates of election of Senators to the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask if there was any protest or exception to it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not at the time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, those were Senators who were to take their seats in this body at that time, were they not?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I think I can throw some light on that matter, for I remember it very well. The credentials were all referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for the purpose of examining their correctness as to form, and they were immediately reported out to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has a distinct recollection of the reason why they were referred at that time. They have not all since been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but there was a reason given by the Chair. The Chair does not know whether it appealed to the Senate or not. It had not anything to do with any charges which were being made against anybody. It simply had to do with the Chair's theory that under the seventeenth amendment, when Senators were elected by the people, it was the duty of the Committee on Privileges and Elections rather than the duty of the officers of the State to determine whether the Senator was elected and his credentials in proper form. That was before the Senate adopted a form of certificate and the credentials were in different forms.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was about to say, Mr. President, that the complete answer to the question about the jurisdiction of this Senate to consider and pass upon the matters involved in an issue of this kind, to determine the election and qualifications of Members of the body, is furnished by the very fact that the credentials are submitted to this Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] requested unanimous consent to withdraw the credentials, to which I objected. I now desire to withdraw my objection, after consultation with the chairman of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the withdrawal of the credentials?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] that the credentials be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not rise to object, but I am one of those who believe that the Newberry campaign expenses ought to be investigated, and I so voted in the committee. At the same time it seems to me to be very clear that these credentials should be received by the Senate, and I shall so vote, though these positions may seem to be somewhat inconsistent. I will refer to that in a moment. The question is argued here to-day of the right of Congress to investigate the election and primary before the beginning of one's term. I have no doubt about it in my own mind at all. We have a national law relating to campaign contributions. It seems idle to say that Congress can not investigate a statement which upon its face might be claimed to be a violation of that law, if for no other reason than that the law has been violated. Surely the investigation could be made to secure information looking to further legislation.

Again, the position that a Senator must present himself here before there can be an investigation has little force. Suppose Mr. NEWBERRY decided that he would not present himself at all to the Senate, or suppose that any other Senator thought there was such evidence of fraud and corruption in his election or in the primaries that he would not present himself and ask for the seat, would it be contended that the Senate was without power to investigate that election? The grossest frauds might be perpetrated and the light of investigation never shine in.

The point that I particularly refer to is this: The Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections decided that this matter should not be investigated by this Congress. That was the purport of the vote. It was not a partisan vote, either. There was no politics, I think, in it. One Republican voted in favor of the authority to investigate and two Democrats voted against it. That seems to me rather in the nature of a res adjudicata as to this question, and the proper way to reach it would be for a motion in the committee to reconsider the action of the committee when those who voted contrariwise come to the conclusion that they were wrong. Feeling that it is in the nature of res adjudicata, and feeling that the only question here is the regularity of the certificate, I shall vote to receive the credentials, although I shall vote in committee and everywhere else for an investigation. The statement filed of a primary expense of $176,000 is enough prima facie to warrant an investigation. I should think Mr. NEWBERRY would welcome such investigation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I simply wish to ask a question.

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment. I withdraw my objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any further objection on the part of anyone else?

Mr. THOMAS. I did not, of course, intend to cut off the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand perfectly.

Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of making an inquiry of some member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I intend to address my inquiry to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who is a member of that committee. I should like to know whether the committee has considered the question of difference between the affidavit as to the expenditures to be placed on file and the certificate of election from the governor. I have not investigated the question myself, but it occurs to me that the affidavits which are required by law to be filed here should be read into the certificate and considered as a part of the certificate. When it appears on the face of the affidavit, as stated by the Senator from Ohio, that a much larger expenditure has been made in this election than the law permits, should not that be taken into consideration and does not that establish a prima facie case of the invalidity of the certificate itself? It seems to me that when this large expenditure appears upon the record of the Senate, in compliance with the requirements of law, the showing made by that affidavit becomes a part of the certificate itself, and prima facie the person presenting the certificate is not entitled to a seat in this body. I think the presumption goes further, that where it appears from the record established under the law that a much larger expenditure has been made than was permitted by the law, the presumption is, and can only be removed by positive evidence, that the candidate himself is responsible for that situation.

I should like to know of the Senator from Iowa if that phase of the question has received any consideration by the committee?

Mr. KENYON. I prefer the chairman of the committee to state what was considered by the committee. I think that question the committee had under consideration, but I may be wrong.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the certificate, of course, in question is made by the proper officials of the State, the governor or the secretary of state, whoever it may be, attesting each other's signatures. The affidavit as to expenses is filed by the candidate. It is filed, I think, several times, once for the primaries and once for the election, and perhaps at certain times before and after the date of the primaries and the election. They are on file in the office of the Secretary.

Mr. LODGE. They are regular.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They appear to be regular on their face. The certificate of election by the duly constituted State officer is offered here. It has not yet been placed on file; it is pending. How one can be read into the other I do not quite understand.

The theory advanced by the Senator from New Mexico that because the affidavit filed by the candidate and filed in the office of the Secretary of the Senate contains figures which seem larger to him than they ought to be, that it thereby creates a presumption that the man is guilty, and that it is upon the defendant, who is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty, to prove that he is innocent, seems to me to introduce a new doctrine into the law of this country.

Of course there is no such prima facie evidence, and there is no evidence whatever or presumption of evidence of guilt until you establish that the large expenditures which exceeded, if they did exceed, the amount provided by law were made with the knowledge and consent of the candidate; and there is no presumption one way or another about that until you take evidence to find whether the candidate knew, or ought to have known, or whether the law implied knowledge to him on that point. No presumption will stretch to a guilty knowledge with intent until there is some evidence to prove it or to prove the circumstances in connection with the transaction.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the certificate withdrawn?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has been unable to determine whether there is any objection to the withdrawal of the certificate or not. The Chair hears none, and the certificate is withdrawn and stricken from the record.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senate will indulge me for just a moment——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Idaho pardon the Chair? If Senators will look at Rule VI relative to the presentation of credentials, they will ascertain what can be done by the Senate. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

ABOLITION OF CONSCRIPTION.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is an election pending now in England, a matter with which ordinarily we would not be concerned. But a statement has been made by the present Premier of England upon a subject matter which, it seems to me, does concern us. I wish to read a single paragraph from his last night's statement or speech:

> On the eve of this important election, which means so much for the country, I wish to make it clear beyond all doubt that I stand for an abolition of conscript armies in all lands. Without that the peace conference would be a failure and a sham. These great military machines are responsible for the agonies the world has passed through, and it would be a poor ending to any peace conference that allowed them to continue. Any delegate who represents Great Britain at that conference must labor to the end I have stated.

With that statement, Mr. President, I am in full and hearty accord. It is the first concrete proposition practical in its bearings with reference to this proposition of world peace that I have seen. I sincerely hope that that which the Premier evidently expressed will happen, to wit, that the people of England will indorse his position, and that the peace conference will carry it into as effectual a result as it is possible for it to do. Conscription is the basic principle of militarism. Without it great military autocracies would be impossible. The world will be grateful to Lloyd George if he forever puts the ban on conscription in all lands and countries.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

Mr. POMERENE. I present a report (No. 614, pt. 2) from the Committee on Privileges and Elections on Senate resolution 360, relating to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I ask that the same be printed for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOG ISLAND SHIPPING PLANT.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before we get away from the subject raised this morning by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and without attempting to discuss in any way the occasion for his remarks, inasmuch as he expressed himself to the effect that he desired to be fair and just with reference to the Hog Island enterprise, I wish to say just a word or two about it.

The fact was mentioned that the yard there had cost some $60,000,000, whereas it was stated that the original estimate was for some $21,000,000. That is scarcely accurate. There was, in fact, really no estimate ever submitted for that yard as it stands now. There was a general discussion about the cost of the yard, and there was a statement made with reference to its probable cost. But later when they went into the enterprise they found that they would need many things they had not figured on, and in order to make it a complete yard, properly equipped and efficient in every way, they went to very much larger expense and built a very much better and larger yard than had been at first contemplated.

It will be remembered that the Shipping Board, or rather the Emergency Fleet Corporation, has been in supervisory control of the whole enterprise, and after it had been discovered what the contracts were with reference to Hog Island and the other agency yards of the Government, located at Bristol, Pa., known as the Merchants, and located at Newark Bay, known as the Submarine Boat Yard, and after these contracts were laid before the committee and these undertakings had been explained to the committee, and we had some information—quite a good deal—as to what was going on at Hog Island, Admiral Bowles was sent there by the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to have direct supervision of the three agency yards. Up to that time some $19,000,000 had been spent at Hog Island. Since then the entire expenditures have been under the supervision of Admiral Bowles, representing the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

As I said, the yard was very much enlarged; and not only that, but since Admiral Bowles went to Philadelphia to look after the enterprises, and especially the Hog Island enterprise, 60 additional ships were contracted to the American International Shipbuilding Corporation, the contractors at Hog Island. The original contract contemplated 50 ships of type A and 70 ships of type B, and there were added to those 120, 60 more ships of 7,500 tons.

Of course, I grant that the cost has been enormous there. The cost has been very unusual, very high, not only at Hog Island but at the Merchants Yard at Bristol and at the Submarine Boat Yard at Newark and other yards of the country.

I think it is fair to say that one reason for the excessive costs was that we were demanding ships be built immediately, in the quickest way possible, such was our need. The contractors were instructed to build ships without attempting to do it upon a business, economic basis, without regard to cost, in effect, because we needed the ships, and it was felt we must sacrifice economy for speed. It was under those conditions and in those circumstances that all these yards have been operated. The ships have cost a great deal more than they would cost in normal times, for the reason, as I said, that speed was the chief consideration and economy was secondary.

Now the Emergency Fleet Corporation has changed that in a good many ways. In the first place, they have eliminated in this yard and elsewhere the overtime feature. Where men worked beyond eight hours they had been paid extra for anything above that. They have eliminated the Sunday work. On Sundays they had been paid for double time. Those items have been eliminated under the present regulations, and that, of course, will save very materially in the future.

In justice also to the contractors at Hog Island I know the Senator from Mississippi will agree that the Government is to pay the actual cost of the land. There are 915 acres of that land, something over 2 miles of water front, and the precise price that the land was contracted to the American International Co. is the price the Government is to pay, plus the 6 per cent, I believe the Senator stated, I am not sure whether it is five or six. That is really immaterial; but there is no profit made upon that purchase at all. The Government gets it at just what it costs the company, enjoys the use of it until the purchase price is paid, plus interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. It is not a mere lease, it is that together with a contract to buy, at the option of the Government.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. Aside from the proposition about the enormous and excessive cost apparently of these matters, what business has any official in the United States of America to denounce a Senator as a liar for a statement made on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not attempting to discuss that feature of the matter at all.

Mr. KIRBY. That feature, it seems to me, might very well be discussed by the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think it needs any discussion by me. The Senator from Mississippi attended to that. That is not the object of my saying what I am submitting to the Senate. I am simply discussing the question of the charge of waste and extravagance at Hog Island, as well as at other yards, but particularly at Hog Island, and, with reference to this particular enterprise, I am saying, as the Senator from Mississippi charges the administration with responsibility for it, very properly it must take that responsibility, because the Shipping Board made this contract, and in fairness to the administration and to the Shipping Board and to the public and to everybody, it ought to be understood, I think, that the International Co. is not making any profit upon the land constituting the site of that yard. We got it for what they secured it under their contract. Of course, they may have paid more for the land than it was worth; they claim not, and that matter was examined at the time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think there is any doubt about that; but can the Senator tell the amount? The Senator knows the amount that has been spent by the Government to raise that land. Three hundred acres of this hog wallow were about 5 feet below high water, and are kept up solely by the dike which was built around the land. Does the Senator know how many million dollars have been spent to fill that up?

Mr. FLETCHER. I could not say.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of course, the Senator knows that if the Government does not carry this thing on the Government can not escape the loss of the millions of dollars that have been planted there in the form of gravel and sand, which raises this land up above high water.

Mr. FLETCHER. I quite agree that it is impossible for the Government to ever reimburse itself there except by acquiring the title to the land. The expense of filling in was enormous, and particularly during the severe winter during which that work was carried on; but I am saying that the Government must buy this land. It is a Government enterprise. It would be folly for the Government not to complete the purchase of that land, for the Government has invested, all told, I take it, somewhere near $60,000,000 on that yard. That includes, I think, the filling in, the bulkheading, the warehouses, the machinery, equipment, and pretty nearly everything that was done there. The piles had to be driven when the ice was some 3 to 4 inches thick; they had to be driven by the assistance of steam being forced into the ground ahead of the piling, in order that it might be driven. Sometimes the ice had to be dynamited and had to be taken out of the way before the piles could be put in. A great deal of the work on the piling which was done under those circumstances, of course, was very expensive. The entire cost of putting in the piling, docking, the dredging, equipping the yards, and building the ways, and everything else is included in the figures of total cost which has been mentioned. It costs something to build a shipway—and there were 50 of them there—and equipping them with cranes, tracks, and machinery costs something. It requires time to do it. It also costs something to build the numerous railroad tracks, warehouses, and other buildings which were necessary to equip the yard; for everything there—I think the whole cost is included in the item of $60,000,000.

Ordinarily five or six years would be a reasonable time in which to complete that yard. This work was done in less than 12 months.

It takes time to build a steel ship. The record of riveting at Hog Island is better than at either of the other agency yards.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It would seem to me that $60,000,000 ought to cover a great many items. The Senator states, as I understand, that when the corporation undertook the construction of this plant there was a very hasty estimate made as to its cost. What did we pay those people for? Does the Senator defend the carelessness of the Emergency Fleet Corporation or anybody else in the expenditure of millions upon millions of dollars of the money of this Government, without going into this matter and understanding it before spending the money? The Senator certainly does not defend the enormous price which was paid for labor, as to which subsequently, after we had protested against it, two or three hundred thousand dollars of the expense was cut off. The Senator does not defend these people for taking this man Goodenough from a salary of $12,000 a year, and the moment he was put on the Government pay roll paying him $25,000 a year. That is in keeping with everything that has been done there. I know that everything was sacrificed to speed, but I do not see how the sacrifice can be carried to the extent of condoning such reckless prodigality in the expenditure of public funds.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, what I am saying with reference to that is that this yard has been very materially changed from the original plan and design to its present capacity. It has been very materially enlarged and extended and is a different yard from that originally contemplated. Of course, the original estimate can not be pressed as a fair and accurate estimate of the cost of the present yard. I am saying with reference to the extravagant expenditure as to wages, and that sort of thing, that the contractors are not responsible for that. The wage scale was fixed by a board, which determined the wages in the various shipyards. We can not lay that to the contractors. I am also saying that we must acquire that property. The Government can not afford to invest $60,000,000 in that plant without going on and completing the purchase of the land and thereby owning it.

I believe myself there was a mistake made in the very outset in attempting too big a yard. We ought not to have had a yard of 50 ways in one place. I think that a yard of from 10 to 20 ways—at any rate, not exceeding 20 ways—would be big enough to be located in any one community. When we get beyond that we are undertaking too much, we are crowding too much, we are congesting too much, we are making necessary the putting up of housing facilities and various other facilities which would not be required if the yard were not so enormous. This is the largest yard in all the world; there is nothing equal to it anywhere. It is a colossal achievement. Hog Island is a city of some 30,000 people, where 18 months ago it was a swamp. Most of them are employed in this work of building ships for the Government. I do not know whether or not the Government will continue to operate these 50 ways permanently, but probably the Government will for some time, and then can use them by leasing some of the ways out or changing them, or something of that sort. I think the original undertaking was too big. It would have been better to build that number of ways in different localities instead of concentrating them at one point. However, it is a great yard, completed in marvelously quick time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to finish.

Mr. THOMAS. I simply want to ask the Senator a question. My information is that none of these ways—I think there are 50 of them—are covered, and that consequently work is prac-ically impossible to be carried on during the inclement seasons of the year. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Florida if that is true?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is true that they are not covered, but I am not well advised if that is not the case as to the ways nearly everywhere.

Mr. THOMAS. I know nothing about it, but that is my information.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think there are scarcely any ways anywhere that are covered.

Mr. THOMAS. A shipway does not need to be covered in the Senator's section of the country, but my information is that unless and until they are covered they can not be operated during the cold season. I know nothing about it personally.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator from Colorado must be wrongly informed about that, for they have been operating these ways in the worst kind of weather.

Mr. THOMAS. They were building them then.

Mr. FLETCHER. They were building them, but they have been building ships in them during pretty severe weather. I do not think it is necessary to cover shipways. I think perhaps it might be better in some respects, but that would call for a very great expenditure, for each of these ways has railroads, tramways, and immense cranes to carry the material back and forth to and from the hull under construction. I do not see how we could operate them very well unless they had very high roofs, and I doubt if it is feasible to cover the ways.

However, passing from that, it will be remembered also, and it is but fair to these contractors to say that they get nothing for their services in the construction of the yard. Under their contract their fee is limited to so much for the building of each ship. A statement is made, which is printed in our hearings, and which we may conclude to go into—at any rate, it ought to be cited here—as a claim by the contractors. I read from the hearings, on page 22, as follows:

> Now that the yard has been practically completed—and a work for which the agent in normal times would have received a fee of practically $5,000,000 has been contributed to this Nation without any compensation whatsoever, but at a cost to the agent of an amount probably in excess of $1,000,000—I think it but just to the American International Corporation that this letter should be printed as a part of your hearings.

In other words, this contractor, the International Co., would have been justly entitled to a fee of $5,000,000 for its services, or compensation to that amount for the construction of this yard, whereas it gets absolutely nothing for it under the contract, and it has furnished its organization, its service, its time, and its energies for many months without any compensation whatever, at an actual cost of approaching $1,000,000, except in so far as that may enter into their compensation for the building of the ships.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the Senator seems to lose sight of the fact that the greater part of the work of construction was done by subcontractors who received a fixed fee of 5 per cent.

Mr. FLETCHER. Some of the work was contracted for, undoubtedly, and I presume the greater part of it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think 91 per cent of it. I never heard of any of it being done except in that way; and that was done for the purpose of getting around the terms of the contract, which prevented the corporation from charging any fee.

Mr. FLETCHER. It had to be done either in that way, or it had to be done by employing people; and that was considered the customary way and the most economical way to have the work done.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from Florida, but I desire to know whether morning business has been concluded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. We have had no morning business this morning.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know that is the case, Mr. President; but the Senator need not make the point, for I have about concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely wish to inform the Senator that I desire an opportunity that the morning business may be proceeded with.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, as a member of the Commerce Committee I can not permit to go unchallenged the defense of the Hog Island project which has just been interposed by the chairman of that committee [Mr. FLETCHER]. I will occupy, however, less than three minutes in presenting to the Senate a few pertinent suggestions which I think ought to be in their minds, if they deal with this subject at all.

First, the mode in which this particular shipyard was constructed was a mode which never should have been adopted. It was a mode by which private individuals were permitted without stint to dip into the Treasury of the United States and spend as they saw fit unlimited sums of money belonging to the people.

Secondly, you might justify that because of the necessities and emergency of war, but the fact remains that they did not deliver the goods; that the ships have not been built after this mode of construction was followed.

Thirdly, the Senator, who is chairman of the Commerce Committee, defends the price which was paid for the land. The fact is that just prior to the contract being made under which the Government was obligated, in case it availed itself of its option to pay $1,800,000, the owners of this land had contracted to sell it for $800,000, and an option of that sort was of record. So much for the price of the land.

Fourthly, the price that it was estimated that this particular shipyard was to cost was $20,000,000. Say it was a hasty estimate, if you choose, nevertheless the fact is that we have expended $60,000,000 there up to this date.

Next, we have expended the people's money in that shipyard to give to private individuals and private corporations certain percentages for what this distinguished admiral who insults a Senator of the United States says was the "know how." We developed in the testimony that not only did we pay the percentage in the contract for the "know how" of the original contractor, but we then paid a percentage for the "subknow how" and a percentage for the next "subknow how" of the next contractor. That is, we took these distinguished gentlemen who knew so much about shipyard construction, who said they would give their knowledge to us for a certain percentage or profit on ships, and then they let contracts to others for a certain percentage, the others knowing how to do what they themselves presumably did not know how to do. So we paid the percentage for the "know how," and then we paid a percentage for the "subknow how."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator knows perfectly well that the contractor was not to get any percentage on the construction of the yard.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No; they were to get it on the building of the ships, and they were to construct the yards. That was the great desideratum and the great consideration—that they had such tremendous and extraordinary knowledge that they would construct that yard; and they performed in part by paying a percentage for a "subknow how."

Then, beyond that, when we dealt with the particular technical organization of one of these intertwined corporations that was doing this work, we paid them 100 per cent additional for the technical men of their organization.

All these things are matters of record—every one of them. I can not discuss them in detail this morning, but they are sufficient to demonstrate that there has been an extravagance in connection with this yard that beggars description; and if an admiral of the United States Navy—I do not know whether or not he is now an officer—but if an admiral who is in the service of the United States designates any statement that there has been extraordinary extravagance and outrageous extravagance there as a lie, that admiral ought to be court-martialed and removed from the service of the United States Government.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The chairman of the committee, Mr. FLETCHER, in speaking of the land where this enterprise is located, said there was a contract of purchase, and I think the Senator from California has inferentially stated the same thing.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I did not mean to do so.

Mr. LENROOT. It was, as a matter of fact, only leased with an option to purchase, which must be exercised within a very limited time after the completion of ships, and if at that time the Shipping Corporation should not have the money with which to carry out the option, or Congress should fail to act, the Government is powerless, and these millions of dollars must go to the International Corporation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator from California takes his seat, I wish to ask him if he can state how many ships have actually been completed at the Hog Island shipyard?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am told this morning by the chairman of the committee that one ship has actually been built. Until he made that statement I did not think there was a single solitary ship that had been completed there. I know that the time for the delivery of these ships has run past.

Mr. SUTHERLAND rose.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator from West Virginia rise to speak on this matter?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; on another matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are trying to get through with the morning business. We have not reached petitions and memorials as yet. There have been half a dozen objections to this discussion, but they seem to get nowhere. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRONNA. I present resolutions adopted by the Farmers' National Committee on War Finance, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FARMERS' NATIONAL COMMITTEE ON WAR FINANCE,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1918.

To Members of the Congress:

The revenue bill reported by the Senate Finance Committee will raise less than $6,000,000,000 during the current fiscal year, whereas the House revenue bill would raise $8,140,000,000. The Farmers' National Committee on War Finance submitted briefs to both the Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee, pointing out in detail how nearly twelve and a half billion dollars could be raised by taxation during the current fiscal year. On behalf of the farmers of America, and in view of the resolutions adopted by organized labor, I think I can appropriately say with the indorsement of organized labor, the Farmers' National Committee on War Finance respectfully asks the Congress to enact a revenue bill which will raise the sum we suggested in our briefs to the committees noted above. We shall not attempt to make any lengthy argument, but merely cite to you certain facts regarding the national income in appealing to you to enact a just revenue bill. First, may we note that America, like every belligerent in this war, is threatened with a spread of bolshevism?

WHY SHOULD CONGRESS FOSTER BOLSHEVISM?

For the Congress of the United States to enact a revenue bill which will raise less than $6,000,000,000 would probably do more than any other single thing to spread bolshevism here, because it would serve notice upon the American people that the interests of the privileged and wealthy classes of the country are regarded by Congress as paramount to the rights of the people. The number of deaths in America every year from preventable diseases, of which poverty is the basic cause, is about five times as large as the total number of American troops killed in this war. It is literally unthinkable that the Congress should agree to a proposition to saddle more of the cost of this war, which has been a prolific breeder of millionaires, upon the workers of the country in order that these few thousand wealthy men may augment their unearned incomes, and already huge fortunes, out of this war. You, gentlemen, appreciate that the concentration of wealth due to privilege in this country is a continuing menace.

TIME TO SET OUR OWN HOUSE IN ORDER.

Now that the forces of kaiserism and militarism have been successfully defeated, it is an essential part of statesmanship to set our own house in order. To tax the workers and producers instead of the wealthy and privileged will be to set our house in disorder. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that the national debt, after we have paid the costs of the war, will be about $25,000,000,000. Some of the bonds issued are to run for 30 years, so that an amount nearly equal to the capital borrowed will probably have to be paid in interest on the loans. This makes a staggering total of nearly fifty billions, including loans to our allies. The figures from official sources, which the committees of both Houses dealing with war finance have had at their command, show that the total national income this year is approximately $72,000,000,000. The estimated net income of corporations for the present year is $9,600,000,000. The personal income subject to the income tax is estimated at about eleven and a half billions, after deducting for dividends. You are aware, doubtless, that less than 2 per cent of the population own 65 per cent of the wealth and that some 23,000 individuals own about one-quarter of the wealth. In all human probability America will never be in a better position to pay a large part of the cost of the war than it is to-day, because of the large money incomes received during the war. The huge war profits of this current year are, in point of fact, not greater than in 1917, when they were approximately $10,450,000,000 The excuse offered for reducing the amount to be raised by taxation is that the business interests of the country must not be interfered with. This is only a pretext.

WHOM DOES CONGRESS REPRESENT?

The Government has demonstrated that it can raise large loans from many subscribers of small amounts, and the issue before Congress is clearly one which can not be concealed, whether the wealth of the country and the profits directly attributable to the war, which have continued to increase during the last three or four years, shall be taken for the cost of the war or whether this burden shall be saddled upon the workers over a long period of years. With our national wealth and national income our entire outlay for the war could easily be paid within 10 years. No legitimate business enterprise will suffer in any way through this policy, because the Government can, if it will, raise money for undertakings through popular subscription, and it would be merely an act of justice to permit those of small means to invest their meager savings in highly productive commercial and industrial enterprises instead of reserving such enterprises as the sole opportunity of those who already possess large means. No liberal who loyally supports the purposes for which we entered the war can understand why the Senate Finance Committee voted to reduce the income-tax rate on incomes between ten and one hundred thousand dollars. In 1916 there were 177,120 families, largely individuals, who received incomes between these ranges, and their total net taxable income was nearly three and a third billion dollars. The total income of that class for this year will probably be close to $4,000,000,000. Neither can any fair-minded person understand how any individual can be permitted to retain an income of one to twenty millions until the cost of the war is fully met, nor why Congress should sanction such unpatriotic selfishness, though this has been done in both the House revenue bill and the Senate revenue bill. Had the German military machine defeated the forces of liberty, the recipients of these huge incomes and possessors of these swollen and privileged fortunes would have paid much more dearly than if they should be taxed as heavily proportionately as the poorest families in America, which is less than we ask. We regret exceedingly that the method of financing the war evidently contemplated by Congress should give even the appearance of justification to the false charge that America entered the war to enable a few individuals to amass huge fortunes therefrom. The enactment by Congress of the revenue bill proposed by the Senate would serve notice not only upon the American people but upon the world that the Congress has repudiated the noble purposes for which we entered the war and has deferred to the greed of un-American profiteers and despised the rights of the common people.

COLOSSAL FORTUNES ARE INCITERS TO WAR.

As you are well aware, colossal fortunes secured through privilege, as is the case with every large American fortune, and huge incomes are a prolific inciter to warfare, and valuable and even essential as is a league of nations to assure permanent peace, nevertheless America will not be fully safe against the temptation to aggressive warfare in the future unless it can compel immediately equality of financial sacrifice in paying for this war. We have demonstrated to many of you previously nearly twelve and a half billion dollars can be equitably secured by taxation during the current fiscal year from the following sources: War-profits tax, $3,875,000,000; income tax, $6,000,000,000; corporation tax, $555,000,000; customs, $230,000,000; tax on value of unused and inadequately used land, $500,000,000; miscellaneous, excise, etc., $1,321,215,000.

We therefore very earnestly request the Congress promptly to enact such a bill and to avoid the charge which it can not otherwise escape of placing unjust burdens upon the soldiers, sailors, and men in other branches of the service, and upon the countless millions of American toilers who have devoted their utmost effort to the successful prosecution of the war in order to secure economic freedom and justice, as well as to destroy political autocracy.

LETTER TO CHAIRMAN SIMMONS.

On December 4 I wrote Chairman Simmons, of the Senate Finance Committee, the following letter, to which I have not yet received a reply:

"We have been asked by many representative farmers to inquire regarding the status of the war-revenue program, and specifically on the following points. Would you be good enough to inform us?

"1. In view of the fact that huge war and excess profits and large incomes have been received during this year and that it is highly improbable that there will be such profits and incomes next year, why were the rates of taxation on incomes of $10,000 to $100,000 so materially reduced by the Senate Finance Committee?

"2. Is it true that it would not be constitutional to enact a revenue bill which would be retroactive, so that if no revenue bill applying to the calendar year 1918 is enacted during the present calendar year the rates of the revenue bill in force would necessarily apply for the current calendar year, under which rates incomes are very lightly taxed and war profits escape practically untouched?

"3. If large war profits and incomes are not taken now, have they not escaped forever?

"4. Has not 'big business' so adjusted its business by now that it can escape much of the taxes collected under the present revenue bill?

"5. What explanation can be offered for the failure of Congress to enact a revenue bill promptly with at least something of the alacrity with which the several liberty-loan campaigns have been organized and conducted?

"There is unfortunately a widespread impression that the enactment of the revenue bill by the House last summer was merely a campaign measure and that there was no intention on the part of the Senate to enact the rates provided in the House revenue bill into law. We can not conceive that anyone would so trifle with a matter of such serious import and shall therefore very deeply appreciate your replying to our questions.

"Yours, very truly, BENJAMIN C. MARSH,
"Executive Secretary."

Mr. GRONNA. I also present a telegram from the Devils Lake Journal, of North Dakota, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed, as follows:

DEVILS LAKE, N. DAK., December 1½, 1918.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Just as mail-order houses are sapping life blood from country merchants, so are Nation-wide periodicals, magazines, and city dailies sapping life blood from country press by carrying mail-order advertising, which in turn destroys country merchants and through unfair mail privileges drive country papers out of business. The zone postal rate is step in right direction and to repeal it would be great backward step. Please stand by country press. Make publishers pay the cost of transporting their output through the mails. At least help publishers who have made North Dakota what it is.

DEVILS LAKE JOURNAL.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a telegram from the North Florida Chamber of Commerce, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TALLAHASSEE, FLA., December 13, 1918.

Senator D. U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.:

Recommend Government control of railroads as asked by Mr. McAdoo, for reason more likely to extend and construct new railroads through lands to be made farms for returning soldiers, and also will tend to keep labor steady and prevent strikes, as occurred under private ownership. Means great deal to development of Florida and other sections of United States.

NORTH FLORIDA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also present a telegram, in the nature of a memorial, from citizens of Ocala, Fla., relative to Government ownership of railroads, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OCALA, FLA., December 13, 1918.

HON. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned citizens of Ocala, wish to express to you and to your colleagues through you our absolute disapproval of Government ownership of railroads and telegraph and cable companies, and believe that they should be returned to their owners. It is our earnest conviction that this policy is taking us away from true democracy and means one more step toward the autocracy of socialism. We trust that when this measure comes before the Senate and House for action that you will take counsel of your constituents, and we believe that they will agree with the above by an overwhelming majority.

BREWERS' GERMAN PROPAGANDA.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, on yesterday I made a statement before the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee which is investigating the charges against the United States Brewers' Association and allied organizations. I ask consent of the Senate that the statement which I there made be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR HOKE SMITH, OF GEORGIA, MADE DECEMBER 13, 1918, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE, APPOINTED TO INVESTIGATE CHARGES AGAINST THE UNITED STATES BREWERS' ASSOCIATION AND ALLIED ORGANIZATIONS.

"Senator SMITH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, on Sunday there appeared in several of the morning papers references to the mention of my name in a letter or report that was presented on Saturday before your committee.

"These newspaper accounts were quite vague, but stated in substance that among the many documents introduced before your committee one addressed to William Byard Hale and supposed to have been written by C. M. Jacobs, of Chicago, gave an account of the work of the American Embargo Conference and referred to me as either supporting the principles of the conference or giving moral support to it.

"As I knew nothing about the American Embargo Conference or C. M. Jacobs, I applied to your secretary Monday for a copy of the paper which made reference to me. He did not furnish it to me until late yesterday afternoon, giving as his explanation of the delay the large number of documents put in evidence and the further fact that the one in which there were a few lines referring to me was very long and he did not succeed in finding it sooner.

"I have now the paper before me. It is a typewritten communication addressed to Byard Hale, signed 'The American Embargo Conference.' The paper is quite lengthy and refers to a great many different things connected with what seems to have been the work of this American Embargo Conference, which was described as seeking to build up public sentiment in favor of forbidding the shipment of war supplies to the allies.

"The paper purports to have been written in July, 1915. The passage referring to me is in this language:

"'The visit of the press men gave us the opportunity to drive home the fact that ours was an American organization; that all of its members had to be voters; and when it was shown that the organization was receiving the moral support of such men as Senators HITCHCOCK, Works, and HOKE SMITH, they departed satisfied that this was one organization that was not a "pro-German movement."'

"I only wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I can not recall ever having heard of C. M. Jacobs before last Sunday. I knew nothing of the American Embargo Conference or its purposes. I never had relations, dealings, or communications of any character with it or its members. I never gave the organization support of any kind, and when the Hitchcock amendment, forbidding the exportation of war supplies to the allies, was before the Senate I voted to lay it on the table.

"The subject of an embargo on war supplies was not before any committee upon which I served, and the only time—so far as I can recall—it was before the Senate I voted to lay it on the table.

"Again let me say, I never had any connection with this association, and I never gave it any support at any time.

"Senator OVERMAN. Do you not suppose, Senator, that this was a mere inference on account of the fight you made in the Senate in behalf of the shipment of cotton abroad?

"Senator SMITH. Well, I was conscious of the fact that for a while in 1915, when I was seeking to enforce the right of American citizens to ship noncontraband goods through neutral ports into Germany and Austria, it was supposed and even charged by some that I was seeking to help the Germans. In point of fact, I was entirely indifferent to the Germans. I was moved solely by the fact that I believed rights of American citizens were being illegally disregarded, and especially by the fact that my own constituents who raised cotton had been cut off from a large market, many of them ruined in the fall of 1914 and the winter of 1914–15 by the low price of cotton caused in large part by the loss of their markets. I was conscious of the fact that the fight I was making in favor of my constituents was misjudged in some quarters; but I deemed it my duty to do what I could to secure for my constituents the right to sell their cotton in every market to which they were entitled.

"Senator OVERMAN. And they at that time were almost ruined by the low price of cotton caused by the loss of markets.

"Senator SMITH. In confirmation of your suggestion, I may say I received letters during the winter of 1914 and 1915 every day—distressing letters—from men whose children were taken out of school, whose stock and farms were lost, who were just financially ruined by the unprecedented low price of cotton, due to the war, and, in part, to the loss of one of their biggest markets, Germany and Austria. They had in prior years sold 3,000,000 bales a year into Germany and Austria, and the loss of that market, together with the big crop, put the price of cotton down below the cost of production. The suffering on the part of my immediate constituents was very great, and I agitated their right all through 1915 to get cotton into Germany and Austria. The hope that they might have a broader market and the threat to create a broader market helped somewhat the market price, and I believe it did induce British interests to come into the market in the fall of 1915 and take over a large quantity of cotton.

"Senator KING. I suppose your position, in part, was this, Senator SMITH, that a belligerent may not of its own volition determine that anything and everything is contraband and interdict the shipment by neutral nations of everything that they may denominate contraband.

"Senator SMITH. That was one of my positions; but Great Britain stopped shipments six months before they undertook to make cotton contraband. Conceding that it was not contraband, they stopped it, and then they undertook to make it contraband. I cited England's own action in the Russian-Japanese war, in which Great Britain protested such treatment of her Indian cotton by Russia and forced Russia to permit that cotton to go free to Japan.

"Senator STERLING. One claim was made, was it not, Senator SMITH, that England found contraband concealed in bales of cotton shipped?

"Senator SMITH. Yes; but I believe there was no truth in that claim. I challenged those making the claim to name a single instance and submit it to investigation. I do not see how cotton could be baled with copper inside of the bale. I never learned of an instance in which it was done. Cotton was seized on the ocean without regard to its being contraband or noncontraband. All shipments of cotton to enemy countries were stopped by Great Britain.

"Senator OVERMAN. And afterwards there was a change of attitude, so that the people were saved from absolute ruin?

"Senator SMITH. Yes; and, frankly, I believe that British agencies went into the market as large purchasers and helped to steady the price of cotton in the fall of 1915, making up, in a measure, for the markets cut off.

"Senator OVERMAN. Then, for the crop of 1915 a reasonable price was paid?

"Senator SMITH. By the fall of 1915 cotton went back to 12 cents.

"Senator STERLING. What was the lowest price?

"Senator SMITH. It had been as low as 5 cents. There really was no market at all for a while. It could not be sold always for 4 cents a pound.

"Senator OVERMAN. You could not sell it at all.

"Senator SMITH. The small farmer raised his crop on borrowed money and had to settle his debts in October and November. He had little market for his cotton in the fall of 1914. Where there was a market the price did not pay what he had borrowed to make the crop. His horses went; his partly-paid-for land went, in many instances. In other instances the children were stopped from school, and the situation was pathetic. The letters that I received from my constituents all over Georgia during the fall of 1914 were distressing.

"Senator OVERMAN. The banks sent telegrams here saying that they were threatened with bankruptcy, because they could not collect their debts.

"Senator SMITH. Yes.

"Senator OVERMAN. This money having been advanced by them to make the crop, they were in bad shape.

"Senator SMITH. Had not the price of cotton risen in the fall of 1915 bankruptcy would have swept over the whole of the cotton-growing States.

"Senator STERLING. Subsequently you got an unprecedentedly high price?

"Senator SMITH. Subsequently the cost of production rose very greatly and the price, like prices of other things, was high. The price has not been higher for cotton in proportion to the prewar prices than for other agricultural products, and the cost of producing the crops has been larger in proportion, because the greater part of the increase in the cost of producing crops has been in the increased cost of labor. No other agricultural crop requires the amount of labor that cotton does. Every boll of cotton must be picked by human fingers, and from the time you start the crop until the time you put your cotton in the gin human labor attaches to it.

"Senator OVERMAN. Notwithstanding that, when the resolution came up, you voted to table it?

"Senator SMITH. Oh, yes; that was an entirely different thing. That was sending munitions to Europe.

"Senator NELSON. I remember the incident very well. I was curious to see what you would do on the Hitchcock resolution, and you voted, as you say, against it.

"Senator SMITH. Yes. My object was to force our rights, if I could, to ship noncontraband to Germany through neutral ports; rights that the President had asserted in his letter of March 31; but whether or not I succeeded in doing that I sought to keep up an agitation in the hope that the market might be strengthened. I also wished to impress upon the British Government, as far as possible, the extent to which they were oppressing a portion of the people of the United States by disregarding their clearly established rights and to induce more liberal purchases from London so as to steady and protect the market. I know that a more liberal price was accorded the cotton crop in the fall of 1915 by British interests.

"This is the only paper before you that refers to me, so far as I know.

"Senator OVERMAN. That is the only one.

"Senator NELSON. Yes; that is the only paper.

"Senator OVERMAN. Are you through, Senator?

"Senator SMITH. Yes.

"Senator OVERMAN. There have been some names mentioned in these records that have been sent here. Of course, we can not tell what is in the records before they are read. The names of numerous gentlemen have been mentioned and we have accorded a hearing to everybody who wanted to be heard in regard to it. Senator HITCHCOCK's name was mentioned as well as yours, and he made a statement on the floor of the Senate which is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and at his request I am very glad to have that statement put in the record of this committee.

"Senator SMITH. I thought of presenting to the Senate the reference to myself, but I concluded the best course was to discuss it before your committee.

"Senator KING. I think that this situation, Senator SMITH, illustrates the great danger that may result from a lax interpretation of the rules of evidence in the admission into records of hearsay, and oftentimes testimony that does not rise to the dignity of hearsay, and good men and innocent men are frequently misunderstood and misrepresented by that sort of testimony. We ought to be very careful in the admission of testimony that reflects upon people where the evidence is not valid or proper.

"Senator OVERMAN. I want to say that this evidence having been furnished by the Intelligence Department of the Army and the Department of State, and most of it from the Department of Justice, was not voluntary. In pursuance of the resolution, and under the instructions of the committee, I requested, as chairman of this committee, that all the documents and evidence in regard to the brewers and in regard to German propaganda should be sent here by some agent of the department for investigation, and these names have come out in certain documents that were found in the Department of Justice, and it is not the intention of this committee to reflect upon anyone, and it accords a hearing to everyone whose name is mentioned here, and is glad to do it. The mention of persons was not volunteered by any department of the Government but comes about in response to letters that I wrote to these departments asking them to furnish evidence that they may have in regard to German propaganda, and, of course, documents are furnished and names are mentioned in the documents, as yours was, Senator, where there was just somebody who wrote a letter stating an opinion that different persons were in sympathy with them, as in your case. Of course, there is nothing to support such a suggestion in your case.

"Senator SMITH. I understood that the Department of Justice did not put this letter in with any view of criticizing me, and the mention of my name was just incident to a long story about other things; still, as it was in the letter, I wished the same record to contain my statement with reference to it.

"Senator OVERMAN. We are very glad to put it in.

"Senator SMITH. I am much obliged to you."

PAYMENT OF THE WAR DEBT BY GERMANY.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I present the statement which I send to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. What was the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To have read something; the Chair does not know what. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will state that it is an editorial from the Oakland Enquirer of December 3, 1918. After it has been read I wish to occupy about one minute in reference to it.

The Secretary read the editorial, as follows:

[From the Oakland Enquirer, Dec. 3, 1918.]

MAKE THE HUN PAY OUR WAR DEBT.

The fighting is over. The natural thirst for power may prolong war conditions, to keep us under the rule of the centurion. Thousands of American soldiers rest in graves that dot an alien landscape. The wounded and maimed are coming home. American prisoners of war are emerging from captivity embittered by every torture that the iron hand can inflict.

The day of plain speaking is here. The President goes to the peace conference to represent the wish of the American people. Does that mean the wish of the small number of parochial politicians, Socialists, and dreamers of bad dreams, or does it mean the wish of 110,000,000 of free-born people, who have furnished the money to be spent and the blood to be spilled in the great struggle?

If the latter, how does the President know the wish of the American people? They have not been consulted. From the entry of America into the war not a single appeal has been made to the patriotic initiative of American freemen. "Do as you are ordered or take the consequences" has been the rule of many of the commissions, and the people have sacrificed their liberties and their lives that the war might be won. And now what? All that we know is that the President goes to the peace conference to urge certain academic ideas of his own concerning an unexplained "freedom of the seas," which has existed for many generations, and the removal of economic barriers between nations, and a league of nations such as has never existed and never will.

How far do these empirical propositions represent the wish of the American people? What material or moral gain do they promise?

At that peace conference France will get back her Rhine Provinces; Denmark her stolen territory; England the German colonies in Africa, to enjoy hereafter the Pax-Britannica; Australia will get the German islands in the Pacific; the Balkan nations will get an ethnological autonomy; Italy will get the irredenta occupied by her people, and will control both shores of the Adriatic; Greece will get Constantinople and control the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus, and all lands devastated by the Hun will get indemnity. Read that over with the map of Europe before you and remember that our soldiers died to make all this possible, and that we, the people, have spent $30,000,000,000 to train, arm, transport, and feed and clothe them.

As a recompense are the American people to be fed on the dry husks, or are we to get what belongs to us?

If we understand the wish of the American people, it is for liberty at home and not State socialism. The German Empire was the greatest Socialist State that ever existed. The State socialized the railways, telegraphs, and telephones, dictated the occupations the people should engage in, and compelled the civilian population to pace the lock step of socialism and the army to keep the goose step of the soldier. Do the American people want that? No; they do not. At the peace conference they have one wish—that Germany pay our war debt. If the President is deaf to this wish, it means that for four generations to come we must submit to a burden of taxation that will sap the foundation of our industry, and, like a vampire, suck the blood from our economic arteries, lower our standard of living, and send us backward. The President's repudiation of this wish will mean that our soldiers come home to bend their backs to a load of taxation such as their sires and grandsires never knew. They have done the fighting; they have liberated the world. Is not that enough? Does the President want them also to pay the bill?

Gather any group of Americans and put to them plainly the issue, "Shall Germany pay our war bill?" and they will answer, "That is our demand."

The great cities of Germany are unharmed. Her mines, mills, factories, and fields are unimpaired. Her economic resources are affluent. She will have neither army nor navy to support. The war has been brought home to her only in the sentimental humiliation of defeat. Make her feel it by paying our war bill to the last dollar, if it takes a century to do it. That is the wish of the American people. They want it because it is justice. Germany can not give us back our dead, but she can be made to leave our sorrow for the dead the only burden left upon us by the war.

If we are to do all for the world we have done and then be left to pay the bill, we become the Don Quixote of the nations, wearing a barber's basin for the helmet of Mambrino and going forth to be spent in conflicts that pay us back in honors that will not pay taxes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the introduction of this editorial—which, in my judgment, very ably and cogently states the proposition that Germany should be made to pay the expenditures of the United States in this war of defense—was occasioned by a statement which I read in the public press a day or two ago from the Secretary of the Navy, who, I assume, spoke for the administration, in which the Secretary of the Navy, undertaking to state the position of this Nation on this question, said that the United States did not want, and would not have, any war indemnity.

I do not think that the Secretary of the Navy, in assuming that position, represents the public opinion of the United States. He does not represent, at least, the opinion of many people. He does not represent my opinion. I agree with the argument contained in this editorial. In litigation between parties in the courts, the successful party, who has the meritorious cause and obtains the judgment, obtains also, as a part of the decision of the court, the costs of the litigation. This greatest of all issues which has been tried out in the court of war has been decided in favor of the United States; and the United States is entitled in justice, in morals, in international law to demand its costs.

The time has gone by when the attitude of altruism and generosity in dealing with the great trusts of government should be maintained. The rights of the American people, the burdens of the American people, are not matters in which the officials of the Government who for the time being are responsible for the conduct of its affairs have a right to exercise their personal ideas of generosity. It is the duty of the Government of the United States to assert and to maintain the interests of the people of this country. Those interests demand that we shall be reimbursed for the tremendous expenditures which have been laid upon the backs of our people for the conduct of this righteous war. Our allies are perfectly willing that we should share in the war indemnity; and I, for one American citizen, resent the attitude expressed by the Secretary of the Navy, the spokesman of the administration, of rejecting the proffered indemnities which in the calculations that have been made have been set aside by the allies as the share of the United States.

ALLOTMENTS TO DEPENDENTS OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I called the attention of the Senate yesterday to the very serious situation that exists with reference to the payment of allotments to dependents of soldiers around through the various States. I know that every Senator here has received numerous complaints of this character. I think it is of the very utmost importance that these dependents out in the States shall receive promptly the amounts due them. There is no reason why this should not be done, and I expect to continue to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to this matter until some improvement is made.

I desire to have printed in the RECORD a letter upon that subject. While we are talking about the millions that have been spent, and about some of which there is some question as to whether they should have been spent, it is only right that we should take up these amounts which have been appropriated for the benefit of the dependent wives and mothers and others around through the country of our soldiers and pay them the amounts which are necessary for their very existence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to printing in the RECORD the matter referred to by the Senator from West Virginia? The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

ST. MARYS, W. VA., December 12, 1918.

HON. HOWARD SUTHERLAND,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am writing you in the interest of Mrs. Marion S. Tice, of St. Marys, W. Va., who is a widow lady. Her son, Franklin L. Tice, No. S 3734731, Company 11, One hundred and fifth-fourth Depot Brigade, is at Camp Meade, Md. He made to his mother an allotment out of his pay, but she has never received but $10 on it, and that was more than four months ago. More than one month ago I wrote the department in regard to this matter for her, but have never had any word from them, not even the courtesy of a reply. I feel that this case should be investigated by some one. I am not in position to do much in the matter, as you know, except to write them. I am a member of the legal advisory board for this county, and it is made my duty to advise and assist registrants and the men in the Army, also their dependents; but when the department is not inclined to even answer my letters or to act in the matter, I am at the end of my authority. Therefore I am writing you in regard to this matter. This boy was the only support this mother had. She has been sick and was at the time they took him in the Army away from her. He has done his part by making her an allotment. Now, it does seem to me that she should have this money. She has no other means of support. I know that she has for the last several weeks been taken care of largely by friends and neighbors. Now, if our Government has to do things this way, it seems to me that there is something very wrong in this matter. It has been more than four months since she received one cent of this allotment. I do not like to complain, but when things go this way I feel that I can not help but to put up a "kick." The Government requires us to do this work. Then not to give it the least bit of attention when we write them regarding it makes me feel that there is something very, very wrong somewhere.

Senator, I hope that you will take this matter up at once and let me hear from you. I am herewith sending you her card advising her of the allotment and hope that after you have examined it you will return it to me for her, as this is all she has.

With kindest personal regards and best wishes, and thanking you in advance for this favor, I beg to remain.

Yours, very truly, C. P. CRAIG.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has said about the allotments to the families of soldiers, I desire to have the Secretary read to the Senate a copy of a letter which has been received by a friend of mine from a soldier in one of the near-by camps in relation to the demobilization. After the letter is read I will remark on it for a minute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

NOVEMBER 7, 1918.

I am writing you these few lines to see if this chapter can help us soldier boys here at Camp Jamison, Ordnance Cos., Amatol, N. J. Our living conditions have gotten to be something intolerable.

We are not doing any work of importance, but still the Government is keeping us here. We are in cold tents, without sufficient heat, half-cooked food, and not a sufficient amount of food. Our pay is being withheld.

The most of us here are men with families, and we want to be mustered out to return to our families, as we are drafted men, and it seems to us as if the Government has forgotten that we are here.

We will certainly be grateful if you will try and have the Government to look into the matter. We made no complaint during the war, but now the war is over and we want to return home.

Yours, respectfully, ——— ———.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, that is a copy of a letter that was written to a member of the Red Cross here, who handed it to me with the statement that they were in receipt of large numbers of letters of similar character from soldiers detained in these cantonments throughout the country. Of course, personally I know nothing of the facts, but I do not believe that the soldiers who write these letters are willfully attempting to deceive anyone. Of course, I can appreciate that they can not all be discharged at once; and I assume, of course, that the war is only over so far as the fighting has ceased. Technically I assume that the war is on until the President issues his proclamation and peace is declared; but I suppose and hope that the policy of the Government is going to be to do everything possible to hasten the return of these men to their business and to their families, and while they are being detained in these camps, even if they are detained uselessly, it is certainly within the power and authority of the Government to see that they have proper heat and proper food.

I hope the Military Affairs Committee will investigate this question and find the facts and apply a remedy if the facts warrant it.

CANCELLATION OF GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand some correspondence in which I know every Senator will be interested. It relates to contracts canceled by the Government. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is a letter from a manufacturer whose contract has been canceled, and the reply to the letter, from Col. R. W. Lea, showing that the manufacturer can not be paid by reason of a statute, because the contract was not signed by the proper officer of the Government, but the order was made and signed by a subordinate officer.

Every Senator has some cases like this in his State. There are thousands of them outstanding, and there is bound to be some legislation on the subject. Now, while I am not in favor of validating every contract, it might be well to take up the question of whether we ought not to have a committee on arbitration to settle these questions.

For example, an order is given for a million pounds of coffee. It is canceled. The man has the material on hand. He has some equity for which he is entitled to be paid. In this case a great many wagons were ordered and a great amount of equipment for the making of wagons was purchased. The Government ordered the manufacturer to do the work, and the man did it. Now he can not be paid for what he has furnished, because under a statute, passed, I think, during the Spanish-American War, the auditor can not pass the voucher because the contract was not signed by the proper officer of the Government.

These officers have been going about and giving orders all over the United States. There are millions of dollars of contracts outstanding. There is no way for the manufacturers to get their money unless there is some legislation on the subject, and a bill for the purpose is now pending.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD the letter from the manufacturer and the letter from Col. Lea to him, and the letter of a very eminent lawyer, who is the head of the Purchasing, Storage, and Traffic Division, in regard to this matter, in which he sets forth fully the information which the Committee on Military Affairs ought to have when they have this bill before them. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WILSON, N. C., December 7, 1918.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The writer called to see you yesterday morning, but found you were on an investigation committee; consequently left without making any interruptions.

The object of calling to see you was in getting a final settlement from the War Department, covering war activities of the Hackney Wagon Co., on orders placed by the Quartermaster Department, Motor and Vehicle Division.

We are inclosing you copy of letter given the writer in person by this division, signed by Col. R. W. Lea, which explains itself. We are also inclosing you copy of contract, showing form of contract which they made with the Hackney Wagon Co.

To be perfectly plain and frank, we are going to state that the Hackney Wagon Co. has tied up in investments of war materials for Government escort wagons and parts and in investments of equipment and machinery to make these wagons and parts approximately $400,000, and by canceling all of these orders it has placed the Hackney Wagon Co. in a very embarrassing position with the banks who financed us in this undertaking. Our unfilled contracts with the Government amount to approximately $600,000. These were to be completed by June 1, and we would have made shipments of approximately $100,000 per month and would have completed these contracts by that time.

Since cancellation of contract we have made claim on the War Department for approximately $235,000, which is the actual inventory of all material on hand, with no cost or overhead charges added on direct cost of raw materials and manufacturer's labor cost included, less the salvage we could use on this material.

It strikes us, in order to relieve these embarrassing conditions to ourselves and other small manufacturers, that the Government should either authorize us to complete these contracts or pass some legislation immediately whereby we could receive remuneration for this expenditure which we have gone to in purchasing these materials and making the necessary changes to get in shape to do this work.

We will further state that these orders came to us unsolicited; we were in a way commandeered by the War Department to put 50 per cent of our output on this work.

We assure you that any efforts you make to speed up this legislation and put it through will be very much appreciated and long remembered by this company and its officers.

With very kindest regards, we remain,

Yours, very truly,

HACKNEY WAGON CO.,
By W. N. HACKNEY, Treasurer.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL OF THE ARMY,
Washington, December 5, 1918.

No. 451.7.
From: Motors and Vehicles Division, Vehicle Branch, O. D. of B. & S. G. S., 3750 Munitions Building, Washington, D. C.
To: Hackney Wagon Co., Wilson, N. C.
Subject: Termination of contracts.

1. This office is in receipt of your statement showing amount which you claim due from the Government on account of the suspension of your contract owing to the cessation of hostilities.

2. Without going into the figures submitted, you are informed under decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, dated November 25, 1918, no payments can be made to contractors when the contract was signed by an agent of the contracting officer and not by the contracting officer himself without new legislation.

3. That portion of the decision of the comptroller follows:

"As to outstanding contracts not signed by the officer named as contracting officer, their validity is open to question, and is dependent upon proof of the fact, if it be a fact, that the officer who signed was a duly authorized contracting officer and made the agreement with the contractor and that the officer named as contracting officer did not. The statute clearly requires the act of one officer in the making and signing and wholly negatives the idea of one officer signing for another.

"The purpose of section 3744, Revised Statutes, has been so clearly stated many times by the Supreme Court, and the result of failure to comply with it has been so often pointed out by that court, that I do not cite or discuss the cases. The decisions of this officer have followed the interpretation of the statute as announced by that court and have been uniform for 40 years or more.

"This office is anxious to do all in its power to meet the situation referred to in your letter and to facilitate settlement with contractors legally entitled to payment on the termination of their contracts. Cases involving only equitable claims can not be settled by executive officers without new legislation."

By authority of the Director of Purchase.

R. W. LEA,
Colonel, Quartermaster Corps,
In charge Vehicle Branch.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PURCHASE, STORAGE, AND TRAFFIC DIVISION,
Washington, December 12, 1918.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have before me the letter from the Hackney Wagon Co. to you, dated December 7, 1918, which you handed me with a request for information as to the status of this company's contract with the War Department.

The situation is exactly as stated in the Hackney Wagon Co.'s letter and in the letter from Col. Lea to the wagon company. During the period when every effort was being made to obtain sufficient supplies for the Army some technical requirements of law, relative to the execution of contracts, were overlooked by officers who had come into the service from civil life and were not familiar with the special and peculiar rules affecting Government contracts. One of the errors which was quite common was the signing of contracts in the name of the contracting officer by a deputy. Most of the wagon contracts made by the Quartermaster Corps, including the contract with the Hackney Wagon Co., were signed in this way.

As long as deliveries of material covered by such contracts were being accepted, there was no trouble, because under the decisions of the courts goods delivered to and accepted by the Government may be paid for at the agreed price, regardless of any informality in connection with the form or execution of the contract. Now, however, acceptance of delivery of materials no longer required has ceased, and supplemental contracts are being made whereby the contractors, for fair consideration agreed upon, consent to a cancellation of the original contracts. No distinction would be made between contractors whose contracts were signed by the contracting officer and those whose contracts were signed by a deputy of the contracting officer but for a recent ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury to the effect that contracts executed by a deputy are not binding obligations on the Government, and that consequently in such cases the consent of the contractor to a cancellation does not constitute consideration for a payment to him. Acting on this ruling, he has declined to allow payments to contractors on such supplemental contracts.

The manufacturers who took these contracts in many cases did so against their will and under the pressure of inability to obtain materials, fuel, or transportation to carry on their usual business. They were not familiar with the technical rulings affecting Government contracts and without question accepted any contract which Government officials gave them. Under the ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury they now find themselves in the unfortunate position of having made large expenditures and incurred large obligations for which they have no legal claim against the Government. In many cases bankruptcy will result unless some method is found to protect them.

In my opinion, all such contracts should be immediately validated by legislation so as to put the contractors holding them on the same footing as other more fortunate contractors whose contracts were properly executed, and thereby enable the War Department to deal with all on the same basis.

In addition to the class of cases of which the Hackney Wagon Co.'s case is typical, there are two other classes where there is danger of contractors suffering great hardship without fault on their part. In the rush to get necessary supplies for the troops it was the common practice to advise the contractor that his bid had been accepted and to urge him to proceed with the work in advance of the preparation and execution of a formal contract. As a result, actual production was always several weeks ahead of the making of contracts, so that when the armistice was signed and purchasing ceased there were many contractors who had proceeded in good faith to carry out contracts not yet formally executed. The Comptroller of the Treasury, in a recent letter to the Secretary of War, questions the right of the War Department to execute such contracts if the material contracted for is not now needed for the supply of the Army. If this ruling stands and nothing is done to relieve the situation, many contractors will be severely penalized because of their patriotic endeavor to cooperate with the War Department in producing Army supplies at the highest possible speed. In my opinion, the doubt raised by the letter of the comptroller should be removed by legislation specifically authorizing the execution of such contracts. The War Department will then be in a position to settle with these contractors on the same basis that it settles with other contractors who are so fortunate as to have their contracts in hand.

The third class of cases arises out of a misapprehension as to the law governing the use of purchase or procurement orders in lieu of contracts signed by both parties. The statutes in regard to different bureaus of the War Department differ widely on this point; for instance, the Quartermaster Corps is authorized to make contracts in any amount where deliveries are to be made within 60 days under such regulations as to form of contract as the Quartermaster General may prescribe. (Army appropriations act for the fiscal year 1916, approved Mar. 4, 1915.) The Engineers, however, may not expend any amount in excess of $500 out of War Department appropriations, except by formal contract executed as prescribed by section 3744 of the Revised Statutes. Nevertheless, owing to a misunderstanding, the Engineers made all of their purchases by means of purchase orders, signed by the contracting officer but not by the contractor. This was unimportant so long as deliveries were accepted, but now that no further deliveries are desired the contractor discovers that, under the ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury, he has nothing on which he can base a claim against the Government for compensation for his expenditures in carrying out the order. In my opinion, either these purchase orders should be given by legislation the status of formal contracts or the War Department should be authorized by legislation to confirm them by formal contracts, so that equitable settlements may be made with contractors who have proceeded in good faith and without knowledge that the Government was not legally obligated.

A bill has been introduced by Senator CHAMBERLAIN (S. 5109) authorizing settlements by the War Department with contractors coming within all of these three classes, but, in my opinion, the remedy provided is not adequate. The settlement authorized by the bill is quite different from the settlement which would have been made if formal contract had been executed, and which will be made with other contractors who have formal contracts; and I can see no valid reason why all contractors should not be treated alike when their difference in status, so far as they are concerned, is purely accidental. This could be accomplished by legislation along the lines suggested in this letter.

The correspondence with the Hackney Wagon Co. is returned herewith.

Respectfully, yours,

W. W. PICKARD,
Chief Award and Contract Branch.
Purchase Administrative Division.
Office of the Director of Purchase and Storage.

THE COAL SITUATION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, prior to the beginning of the war, I am reliably informed, the charge for storing coal in the bins in the District of Columbia was 25 cents a ton. I have also been informed that sometime ago the fuel administrator for the District of Columbia fixed the maximum charge for doing this work at 75 cents a ton. I am also reliably informed that this order is not being lived up to at all, that no attention is paid to it, and that a charge is made which is greater than 75 cents a ton.

I therefore introduce the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration. It is designed to ascertain whether or not the fuel administrator is taking any steps to enforce his order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 387) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the fuel administrator for the District of Columbia be directed to inform the Senate what steps he is taking to enforce the order made fixing the maximum charge for putting in or storing coal at 75 cents a ton in the District of Columbia, and, if no steps are being taken to enforce said order, to inform the Senate why this is not being done, and by what authority of law was said order issued.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have no objection to asking for the information, if it is done in a form which does not appear to involve the sanction of the Senate to this order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, I have not intended to do that at all.

Mr. REED. The fuel administrator in Washington, of course, has just as much authority to fix the price for putting in coal as he has to fix the price of any man's wages, and it is time that this assumption of arbitrary power should cease everywhere in the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say to the Senator that I am not assuming that he had authority; but, as I understand, he issued the order, and now I want to see what he has done in the way of trying to enforce it.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will strike out the words which appear to be a sanction by the Senate of this regulation, I have no objection.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will indicate the words he wishes to have stricken out, I will gladly do it.

Mr. REED. Let me see the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask leave to withdraw the resolution for a moment so that the Senator may have an opportunity to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be temporarily withdrawn.

Mr. JONES of Washington subsequently said: Mr. President, I offer the resolution in a modified form, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is entirely satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution as modified.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the fuel administrator for the District of Columbia be directed to inform the Senate what steps he is taking to enforce the order made fixing the maximum charge for putting in or storing coal at 75 cents a ton in the District of Columbia, and if no steps are being taken to enforce said order to inform the Senate why this is not being done.

The resolution as modified was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

THE REVENUE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 12863.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber yesterday when subsection 18 of section 900, Title IX, was reached. I desire that the action of the Senate by which the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be reconsidered.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask that it may go over, to be considered with the amendment which I filed this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will go over.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smoot
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Spencer
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Sterling
Curtis	Kendrick	Poindexter	Sutherland
Dillingham	Kenyon	Pollock	Thomas
Fernald	King	Pomerene	Thompson
Fletcher	Kirby	Ransdell	Townsend
France	La Follette	Reed	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Robinson	Vardaman
Gay	Lewis	Saulsbury	Walsh
Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard	Warren
Gronna	McKellar	Sherman	Watson
Hale	McLean	Simmons	Weeks
Harding	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Md.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is unavoidably absent, owing to illness.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT addressed the Senate. After having spoken for nearly an hour and a half, Mr. SMOOT said:

Mr. President, I have here a great many other matters that I intended to put into the RECORD, but I do not want to do so,

I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that the next question I desire to discuss is a most important one, and I have been asked by a number of Senators to get it up into such shape that they can answer the letters on the subject that have come to them. I refer to the relief provisions of this bill. I am quite sure that there is no Senator here who has studied the bill but who feels that the bill is a great improvement over the House bill in its relief measures in the clarification of paragraphs as written in the House that it would have been hard for anybody really to understand. I do not feel like entering upon that subject to-night and quitting in the middle of it; but if the Senator from North Carolina wants to insist upon going on to-night, I will get somebody to read these articles or items that I desire to go into the RECORD, and then I will continue my remarks on Monday morning.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator must understand that I have not in anything I have said stated that I wanted to interfere with his argument. If the Senator wishes that his argument, or whatever it may be called, shall go over until Monday, I certainly have no objection to pursuing that course.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I do not feel like going on to-night, with my throat in the condition it is, and I do not think the Senator would gain any time by having the Senate remain in session this Saturday afternoon. We all want to get everything cleared up if we can. The Senator must know that there is no disposition on the part of any Senator to delay the passage of this bill. I am certainly satisfied of the truth of what I state here. Of course, questions may come up for future discussion and I shall briefly speak on them and ask for a vote of the Senate at an early day. I know of no bill of its magnitude and of such interest to the people of the country that has ever been passed as this bill. If it were not Saturday afternoon I would go on, but really I do not want to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator says he has finished his argument——

Mr. SMOOT. On this one subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. On expenditures, and is now about to proceed to another subject.

Mr. SMOOT. The relief provisions of the bill—and I wish to say to the Senator that I have it in such shape that I can present it here condensed upon every subject, so that if there is any Senator who desires to know just what are the relief provisions of the bill of any one section he can simply turn to the relief measure, if it is section 231, and also tell just exactly where other relief measures covering the same thing can be found.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no doubt the statement of the Senator is a very valuable one and will be very serviceable to the Senate. I am glad he has given the labor necessary to make a statement of that sort. If the Senator feels like he ought not to go on to-night——

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly feel that way.

Mr. SIMMONS. I, of course, shall not insist, but I had hoped that if the Senator discontinued his remarks this afternoon we might take up the bill where we left off and go on with it this afternoon.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator the very first thing is the inventory provision, one of the most important sections of the whole bill, and not particularly that section but other parts of the bill that have reference to it. I think it vital to the bill. Sometimes I think that the relief provisions have gone almost too far, and yet as a whole I think they are absolutely necessary in order to maintain the business of the country in a position to meet the requirements upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has alluded to one of the most important sections in the bill, and it is being dealt with, I think, in a spirit of very great liberality, and one which will be greatly appreciated by the people of the country. Of course, if there is objection to taking up that subject this afternoon because Senators who may desire to present their views on this important question are absent, we can let it go over until Monday.

Now, I wish to ask if the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], upon whose motion the income-tax sections of the bill that we have just reached were passed over, would be ready to go on this afternoon?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator would not be willing for the Senate to take up any of those sections and discuss them and act upon them this afternoon?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not want to interfere with the Senator, because I desire to proceed as rapidly as possible, but——

Mr. SIMMONS. I am just trying to see if we can not go on this afternoon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not want to have them disposed of this afternoon, or if they are voted upon I want them voted upon with a unanimous-consent agreement that they shall be reconsidered whenever amendments are prepared and ready to be offered to them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say to the Senator that it would be the worst sort of policy to take up a section of the bill for the purpose of discussion without having any purpose to act on it when the discussion is terminated.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator desires to insist on going on, we can go on with the bill and when the bill gets into the Senate, the Senator from Wisconsin could offer his amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin another question. I am deeply interested in expediting the bill in every way I can, because I think the country is a little impatient about the bill being passed, and I think the requirements of the department with reference to its administration are such that we can not afford to waste any time which we could utilize to advantage. If we can not utilize the balance of the time this afternoon to advantage, of course the bill will have to go over; but in this connection I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if the bill goes over until Monday will the Senator then be ready?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am not going to ask the Senator to forego proceeding with the bill this afternoon or at any other time when he desires to proceed with it. I am not going to take any responsibility. I shall be ready with my amendments as soon as I can prepare them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not complaining——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. When I have them ready I shall offer them here, and if it becomes necessary for me to move to reconsider anything adopted before I have the privilege of offering them I shall take that course.

I have not had the opportunity, Mr. President, to have the services of the expert, who has been at the elbow of the chairman of the committee for two or three months, until yesterday morning for about two hours.

Mr. SIMMONS. He was at the service of the whole committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not at the service of the whole committee at the time when the committee was not in session. When the committee was not in session I know a good deal of the time of the expert was taken up by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. When the Senator asked for him he was turned over to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He was turned over to me yesterday morning for two hours.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think there is any occasion for the Senator to become excited about it. I simply wanted to find out whether, if the bill went over, he would be in any better position on Monday than he is now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am unable to say, not being certain that I would have the services of the expert in figuring out the percentages that were necessary for me to have computed in order to prepare the amendments for this portion of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin, I wish to say that for next week I am going to move to take a recess instead of an adjournment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). The Chair calls the Senator's attention to the fact that it would be out of order to move a recess at this time, as the Senate has agreed to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is very true, but the motion can be made to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be made to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I started to say is that on Monday, when we take up the bill, as far as I can I shall insist that we act upon the amendments as we reach them. Of course, I know there will be some exceptions to that rule, but in the main I am going to insist upon taking up the amendments and disposing of them as we reach them. I regret very much that under the circumstances we can not go on longer with the bill this afternoon.

Mr. NEW. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. NEW. I offer an amendment to the bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, without objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Sunday, December 15, 1918, at 11 oclock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 14, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Earle Wilfley, pastor of the Vermont Avenue Christian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, we thank Thee this morning for the pathway of life that sometimes seems hard, but which, if we walk in it aright, becomes a path of pleasantness and peace. So we ask Thee for strength, O God, to do that which is pleasing in Thy sight and which commends itself to the sense of right of all men. We would remember before Thee this morning especially, our Father, our soldier heroes who are returning in constantly increasing numbers from the battle front, some of them broken and maimed in body, but, we thank Thee, undaunted in spirit. Bring them home, O God, with honor and with the plaudits and praise of a grateful Nation and to the loving devotion of those to whom they are so dear.

Wilt Thou bless the session of this House to-day and make us worthy of Thy blessing? For Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, December 10, 1918.

To the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have this day forwarded to the governor of Virginia my resignation as a member of the House of Representatives from the Sixth Virginia district, to take effect on Monday, December 16.

Sincerely, yours,

CARTER GLASS.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 13261. An act providing for the transportation from the District of Columbia of governmental employees whose services no longer are required.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. At the memorial service for Senator TILLMAN to-morrow the Chair appoints the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] to act as Speaker pro tempore.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 13308) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado in the chair.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-two Members present; not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 13308, the Post Office appropriation bill, finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, when 280 Members responded to their names, and he reported a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent general debate was limited to six hours, three hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and three hours by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON]. The gentleman from Minnesota has used 40 minutes. The gentleman from Tennessee has not occupied any time. He is now recognized.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, if I am permitted, I will attempt to discuss some of the facts connected with the bill and some of its main features as they may appear to me. To that end, inasmuch as I have no manuscript or notes or orderly line of discussion, I ask the close attention of the House. A little later on I shall discuss other matters of national importance while I have the floor. The Post Office Department had a very small beginning. I believe the sum of about $17,000 was expended the first fiscal year for the service, to the very great disgust and chagrin of the people and statesmen of that day. We have lived to see this bill, under the development of the department, reach the enormous sum of three hundred and sixty odd millions of money. The present bill carries $359,000,000 in round numbers. And yet, with the extension of this service all over the United States, with its extension to thirty odd nations by convention, carrying the mail to the four quarters of the earth, this great department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, secured a revenue of some $19,000,000 surplus, after all expenses of the department were paid, to be turned into the National Treasury to meet general expenses. This is greatly to the credit of Postmaster General Burleson and his postal forces. In the development of a great business institution like this, affecting each and every citizen of the country, the Congress should be liberal and encourage progressive measures in the service for the benefit of the people.

I recollect within my service on the committee that the bill carried only $89,000,000 with a deficit of $17,000,000. That was the beginning of the rural free delivery, a wise and valuable service, that is not yet a paying service, but a service on which we lose much. The people are entitled to the best possible mail service. The employees of the Government are entitled to just and adequate compensation for this service. Therefore the increase in the pay of the low-salaried mail clerks, carriers, and others has been provided for in this measure. As we have in the past extended and improved the service and increased moderately the salaries of employees we have benefited the public and made the department self-sustaining as a whole and produced a surplus revenue. Let us move forward to the full development of this splendid service.

The Post Office Department is one of very ample power. It carries the mails by footmen, by rail, by boat, by ships, by motor vehicles, horse-drawn vehicles, by aeroplanes, and we carry it by truck from the city to the country. We are developing this great system all along the line. Of necessity there must be experiments, experiments for a long period that will not pay, and yet are of such value and service to the country that we ultimately resolve them into the fixed system of administration.

Take the rural free delivery—is there any man in this House that would want the rural delivery to cease with its 45,000 routes and carriers carrying the mail to the people of the whole country? Yet that service lacks 20 odd millions of money to pay its way.

We have attempted to secure an increase in the rates of second-class matter. We are carrying the second-class matter of the United States at a loss of more than $60,000,000 after the recoupment of $20,000,000 under the last revenue measure, yet we must carry second-class matter, the papers of the country.

We have another service, the aeroplane service. It is new, it is untried, and it is experimental. It may prove of great benefit and advantage and it may not. The experiment, I am advised, as shown by the report of the Postmaster General, so far as the long routes are concerned, is entirely satisfactory. It is compensatory on the route between Chicago and New York. It has not been a paying service between Washington and New York, but it is more and more becoming perfected.

Now, only a moment on that section. The committee has transferred the aeroplane service from the steamboat and other power-boat service to the inland transportation, and we are providing for $2,185,000 for that service. The reason is that we want the experiment made quickly, promptly, and effectively, so that if the Government is inclined to make permanent this service it may obtain it quickly. The complete experiments can not be made properly for less money than that. The committee raised the estimate of the department for that purpose.

By the way, I may say that the aeroplane service is one that is more expeditious by far than any other service, and the cost is perhaps twice that of any service, both as to postage and otherwise, but it is a service that will be in its nature special, and if used, and it probably will be, will be entirely compensatory. The motor truck has united the farm with the city, and brings the purchasers of commodities in the city to a close market with the country, and the country to the city, and so far has proved very effective.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. GARD. May I ask the gentleman to enlighten the House as to what the postage rates are for the carriage of mail by aeroplane?

Mr. MOON. Six cents for letters. There have been, I believe, 31 motor routes established. The experiment has been made upon 19 routes, where the facts have been fully collected and all information ascertained over a period beginning the 1st of July and ending the 30th day of September. That experiment shows that the Government of the United States has received a revenue from those 19 routes of $8,889, net, over all expenses incurred in the operation. This would indicate that every route that might be established from a great city going out into the country for the collection of produce and carrying from the cities the goods to the country will be compensatory or self-paying. That service, if it is limited to the large cities, will have instead of 31 routes, now in force, some 250. That is practically the limit to which that service will go. Those routes will unquestionably yield a great revenue, and we have provided in this bill for $1,000,000 for further experiment along that line.

These are the new features of the bill to which I call your attention. There is contained in this bill also that legislation which we passed in the last Congress reclassifying the railway mail clerks, the postal clerks, and carriers, fixing the compensation for them, and also the compensation for the rural carriers as fixed in the last bill. This bill seeks to make permanent the law that was temporary by the provisions of the previous bill. We provide here so that the postal clerks shall have that vacation when holidays come fixed by the President in pursuance of law that are had in the other departments of the Government. Strange to say, they have not enjoyed fully that privilege heretofore. A reclassification of all of the official positions in connection with the Post Office Department and a readjustment of salaries upon a basis that will be equitable and just is altogether essential at this time. There are divisions in this department where men sitting side by side, doing identically the same work through the same length of hours, where one clerk may receive $1,200 and the other $1,400, an inequality which calls for relief. We have provided, therefore, in this bill for a commission to be appointed under the provisions of the act that will look into the questions and reclassify the salaries and report to the Congress for its actions.

The other features of the bill are practically the same that are usually carried in the annual appropriation law. The increases granted in the amount necessary for the service are due to the normal increase in the service in the instances where it is increased, but where by reason of economy in administration services may be combined, and a decrease has been effected, that decrease appears on the face of the bill.

These are the features of the bill which I felt necessary to call your attention to before the discussion under the five-minute rule, when, of course, every paragraph of this bill will be thoroughly discussed, if not understood by the House, and such information given as we are capable of giving.

The Congress changed the method of compensation to railroads for carrying the mails a year or two since from the weight basis to the space basis, with which you are familiar. While under the new system the railroads are amply compensated for the space used and the transportation of the mails, a saving of over twelve millions of dollars in the last fiscal year has been made to the Government by this change in the law.

Mr. Chairman, the development of the power of the Government under the section of the Constitution that authorizes the establishment of post offices and post roads has not only kept pace, but it has advanced beyond the development of many other powers of the Government as provided under the Constitution. We all understand the theory of our Government, that it is a representative Republic under a Constitution, that neither the Federal Government nor the State Government is a complete sovereignty; that is, the States have certain reserved rights (or the people thereof) that are sovereign in their nature that they alone can exercise. There are certain inalienable rights that neither State nor Federal Government has that belong to the citizens. The greatest of the three in the trinity of sovereignty is the Federal Government, and although we speak of its powers (as they are) as delegated powers, although we proclaim that the Federal Government can not go beyond the powers expressly granted to it in the Constitution, or those fairly implied from the powers granted to carry into effect those granted or delegated powers, still, though limited, the power is greater, tenfold greater, even in a few (much less all) the sections of the Constitution than all the powers that have been reserved to the States.

I shall not in this connection undertake to unfold the development and growth of governmental power under that clause of the Constitution that provides that Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce. I shall not undertake to show you, as I might, that under the banking and currency clause of the Constitution the Federal Government might drive all men out of the banking business and establish banks and loan money. Its powers under the sections where it has power delegated are exclusive. It is an omnipotent power, and all the other powers of Government may be called into requisition to enforce a single power within that Constitution, where fraud or injustice is attempted to be perpetrated upon the exercise of jurisdiction under the powers. So he who thinks that there is any supreme power in the United States that is effective save locally other than that delegated in the Federal Constitution has misconceived the extent of the Federal power.

What is the meaning of those simple little words in the Federal Constitution that Congress shall have power "to establish post offices and post roads"? Does it alone mean the place where letters may be deposited for the purpose of distribution to the people, carried by instrumentalities, by which they are distributed? Does it mean simply that you have the right to lay out the path to be traveled by the carrier under that clause? In view of the meaning of the terms as understood when the Constitution was framed it was impliedly, if not expressly, conferring upon Congress the exclusive jurisdiction to control, manage, and own, if it sees fit, every means of communication of intelligence. What have we done under that power in the control of intelligence or the communication of intelligence? We have said what mail matter may be sent. We have said it may be a letter, a postal card, a book, a newspaper, or a parcel-post package. We have defined the limit of the parcel-post package. If we can limit it to 50 pounds, we can, by the same power and authority, fix it at 100 pounds, and if at 100 pounds we can fix it at 1,000. There is no limit to the legislative discretion on this question. What as to the instrumentalities? We have called into requisition the pedestrian, the man with the vehicle, be it horse drawn or motor, and, as I have already said, the steamboat, the railroad, and the aeroplane.

Then if you have the right to do that, as you have, you have the right to establish the means by which the communication of intelligence can be conveyed. Then, necessarily, as an implied power from that expressed power in the Constitution, you have the right to own those instrumentalities. You have the right in your legislative discretion, which can not be controlled by the court or any other power on a question like this, the right to authorize the Government to own the thing out of which those instrumentalities may be made. How far, then, can you go in the exercise of that power? You can unquestionably own the vehicles, which you do own in many instances, by which the mails are carried and delivered. You can lease or own the steamboat or ship for that purpose; you can lease or own the railroad for that purpose, though under another power of the Constitution controlling commerce railroads may also be owned. You may own the telegraph and telephone for that purpose. It is a prime means of communication of intelligence more quickly, more expeditiously, than any that we have.

How much further can you go? If you can own the instrumentalities and own the things necessary to construct them, can not you by virtually the same power own the coal mines that become necessary to give you the fuel to propel the engines and steamships that carry your mail? Can not you own the forests from which you obtain the material by which you can construct, as you have the right and the power to do, the cars and ships for this purpose? It may be said that Congress will never go so far as to extend this power along these lines, that it would be an invasion of the field of private enterprise that could not be and must not be tolerated. True enough. Let me tell you that when this wondrous Constitution is fully enforced and when all the power of the Federal Government both political and in the administration of its economical affairs has been fully developed, when every advantage to the Federal institution has been obtained that can be obtained under the Constitution, you will have in these United States an imperial republic greater than any Government in the exercise of its power that ever lived upon this earth.

The day is not far distant when the task of the American statesman shall be to ascertain to what extent the legislative, executive, and judicial discretion under the Constitution may prevail in the interests of the citizens and yet preserve strong, powerful, and effective Federal institutions. But, while these things are all true, there must be a proper development of the powers of government. The Post Office Department is entitled to every auxiliary that will give aid to the people in obtaining intelligence. This Government has the powers of a monopoly on this question. We ought to go to the verge of obtaining the means, at least, and the right to control the transmission of intelligence. That is done most effectually through the telegraph and telephone.

The postal system of the United States can not be, it will not be, more than half developed until these magnificent auxiliaries are attached to it, in my judgment, for the purpose not of an increase of revenue, though it would bring an increased revenue of many millions, perhaps hundreds of millions, but for the legitimate constitutional purpose of the maintenance of a post office system, the establishment of roads, the use of roads for that system; and when I say roads in this connection I mean the electric wire that flashes the intelligence from one part of the world to another quickly, as well as the established rural route. This is a progressive proposition for the development of a department under the Constitution, and provide it with the instrumentalities to which it is entitled to make it a perfect power in the interests of the people.

But, they say, you will invade the field of private business. My answer is that control of the means of communication of intelligence is a monopoly that under the Constitution belongs to the Government and if private individuals have exercised that power, as they have the power of government in other respects, there is no injustice of depriving them of it and restoring the power under the Constitution where it belongs and where it ever has been and must be if the Constitution is obeyed in the government of the United States. Then there are but a few of these great telegraph companies in the country to be effected. The Government should own them as a necessary auxiliary to the postal system. The Government should not enter upon this field without the slightest regards to the existing rights of the telegraph companies, although under the Constitution it might do so. It would neither be wise nor just to do it because the Government has tolerated the use of the telegraph and telephone by private companies, which are primarily a part of the system of the Post Office Department. Having procured the use of the means of intelligence which belongs to the department to be exercised by private corporations before taking it over it ought to compensate those corporations. Now this is no new question. I hold in my hand the Statutes at Large of the United States. You will find on pages 221 and 222 the act of Congress of July 24, 1866, on the subject of the telegraph.

I insert it:

Be it enacted, etc., That any telegraph company now organized, or which may hereafter be organized under the laws of any State in this Union, shall have the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States which have been or may hereafter be declared such by act of Congress, and over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States: Provided, That such lines of telegraph shall be so constructed and maintained as not to obstruct the navigation of such streams and waters or interfere with the ordinary travel on such military or post roads. And any of said companies shall have the right to take and use from such public lands the necessary stone, timber, and other materials for its posts, piers, stations, and other needful uses in the construction, maintenance, and operation of said lines of telegraph, and may preempt and use such portion of the unoccupied public lands subject to preemption through which its said lines of telegraph may be located as may be necessary for its stations, not exceeding 40 acres for each station; but such stations shall not be within 15 miles of each other.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That telegraphic communications between the several departments of the Government of the United States and their officers and agents shall, in their transmission over the lines of any of said companies, have priority over all other business, and shall be sent at rates to be annually fixed by the Postmaster General.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the rights and privileges hereby granted shall not be transferred by any company acting under this act to any other corporation, association, or person: Provided, however, That the United States may at any time after the expiration of five years from the date of the passage of this act, for postal, military, or other purposes, purchase all the telegraph lines, property, and effects of any or all of said companies at an appraised value, to be ascertained by five competent, disinterested persons, two of whom shall be selected by the Postmaster General of the United States, two by the company interested, and one by the four so previously selected.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That before any telegraph company shall exercise any of the powers or privileges conferred by this act, such company shall file their written acceptance with the Postmaster General of the restrictions and obligations required by this act.

Approved, July 24, 1866.

The telegraph companies then recognized that they were seeking to invade the field of Federal jurisdiction on the question of the transportation of intelligence. The Congress recognized that fact, and therefore when in the first section they conferred certain powers upon the telegraph company, yielding to it in part its sovereignty in interstate matters and in the control and construction with reference to means of communication, giving to a private corporation a part of the power that the sovereign possesses, it reserved—what? The right to put an end at any moment to the private ownership of telegraph companies then in existence or that might thereafter be in existence. And we find in the third section of the act a power conferred to take over telegraph lines as an adjunct, where, in the Constitution, it belongs alone, to the Post Office Department. That third section provides that in pursuance of this act—and I quote not the language but the substance of it—the Congress may take over, own and control, and operate as a part of the postal system the telegraph lines of the United States.

It provides that a commission of five shall be appointed—two by the Postmaster General, two by the telegraph companies, and the fifth one by the four appointed—whose duty it shall be to investigate and appraise the value of the lines owned by different companies and report the same with a reasonable value to the Congress of the United States, that it may take over the lines. What did that mean? What was the interpretation of the Congress then? That must be its interpretation now. It was that the telegraph naturally, as a means of communication and the best means of communication, was inevitably linked with the Federal postal system and essentially a part of that system. Therefore, when private corporations were permitted to develop it and obtain the benefits to which the sovereign was entitled in the first instance it laid the burden by law on the corporation to abandon its hold upon this public instrumentality and, when Congress should demand, to return the telegraph where it once was, as an instrument auxiliary to the postal system of the United States. Hence the law, hence the construction, forsooth, not merely of the policy but of the constitutional right and privilege of the Congress to control this means of communication.

The time, in my judgment, has come when Congress must reassume its jurisdiction over this question for the benefit of the people. He, indeed, is foolishly inclined who thinks there is an invasion anywhere of private rights in doing so. It is but a resumption of the power of government temporarily abandoned and now proposed to be resumed. I have introduced a resolution which will carry into effect the provisions of the act of July 24, 1866.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. GARD. Is it the gentleman's purpose to include this very interesting statute in his remarks so that we may have the benefit of it?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Congress is not without authority under the Constitution to extend its power and "to lengthen its cords and strengthen its stakes" on every foot of American soil, but in doing it, if it undertakes the exercise of a power that is merely an implication upon an implication, entitled to be enforced by other provisions of the Constitution if necessary to its enforcement, it may run your Government, and will, into an imperialism. It may make the Federal head too strong. There may, and ought to be, perhaps, a limitation, as I have remarked, upon the legislative discretion in reference to these features. But will the country permit the Congress to be shorn of that power so clearly belonging to it, not as an implied power merely, but as a self-evident power under the terms of the Constitution? I hold, sir, that this postal system will have accomplished and can accomplish only half-way the purposes for which it was intended if you do not restore to its jurisdiction, the exclusive jurisdiction, the power that it has under the Constitution to control every means of communication of intelligence, particularly the splendid, the magnificent means of communication—the telegraph.

You would let the Government be maimed and crippled in the exercise of its power and private corporations continue to exercise governmental functions if you refuse the right under this statute to the restoration of this instrumentality.

I know that there are two views of constitutional construction that must be considered. I speak not particularly of this telegraph question now, because I think that is too clear to need argument to elucidate it; but generally, in speaking of the construction of the Constitution and the powers under it, we can very readily demonstrate how a government may run to an excess on either view of construction. Why, a monarchy is the parent of despotism; the republic is a creator of liberty. An extreme monarchy is dangerous to human rights; an extreme democracy is just as dangerous to human rights.

The government with a constitution, the government with representatives under that constitution to enforce it, a government that is limited to the exercise of the powers of the constitution fairly, is the only safe government for a people. If you give over the great railroads of your country, with the millions of employees, to the control of government ultimately and finally—and that does not apply to the means of communication I have been discussing, of the telegraph—if you turn over the railroads of the country with its millions of employees, with the power under this section and under the commerce section of control, if you give the broad construction to all the other powers of government by which the forces of government in its administration may be increased in power and number, you will soon bring a condition under which the people will be forced to contest and to redeem the government from its employees. You will provide a dangerous despotism which must be avoided, I insist, at sometime by proper constitutional limitation.

Yet, on the other hand, if you so broaden the powers of the people as to destroy representative government, and shall leave to the people at the ballot box the determination of controversies between the citizens; if you shall, like ancient Athens, permit them to banish the citizen by the private ballot; if you shall give to the populace the means and exclusive right of a veto upon legislation, you will have destroyed the principles of human liberty, because you will have destroyed the spirit of the Constitution and representative government under it. But let us not fear any dangers of this sort when we simply bring back to the Federal Government and restore to its jurisdiction one of the arms of its administration to which it is entitled under the Constitution for the promotion of the business and social welfare of all the people.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. BLACK. Has the Government of the United States ever owned any telegraph companies? Has it ever gone into the telegraph business? The gentleman says it will be simply restoring something to the Government.

Mr. MOON. Restoring the right.

Mr. BLACK. It has not been exercised?

Mr. MOON. The Government of the United States exercised the right to control the telegraph during and after the war of 1861–1865, just as it is doing now under the military power of the Government. But the telegraph companies were a new thing——

Mr. BLACK. Will not the gentleman admit there is a difference between the question of control and that of ownership and operation?

Mr. MOON. Oh, of course. Anyone in the world who knows the meaning of the English language knows that control means one thing and ownership another thing. My insistence is that under the Constitution you have not only the right of control which we have now under the law and which is exercised, exercising it strictly—and you always have had it—but you have got the right to own that instrumentality just as much as you have got the right to own the post office, just as much as you have the right to own the building in which you collect the mail, or the vehicles upon which it is carried.

But I want to depart from that discussion. I was only speaking of the danger of the exercise of some of our powers of government and the danger of the failure to exercise others.

There is not so much danger in the exercise of the power that will bring the beneficent results that the ownership of the telegraph and telephone will bring as in the exercise of a power, in my judgment, that would bring to this Government millions of employees, with high prices that would be established at the expense of other citizens of this Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, if I may be indulged for a few moments, under the license allowed in this debate, I will speak of that all-absorbing question—our foreign relations and the duties and responsibilities of this Government. We need offer no apology for our entry into the great European war, because Germany, in the enforcement of her imperious will, sank our ships, murdered our citizens, and denied our international rights upon the high seas.

That alone was a sufficient justification for our entry into the war, and I would not place this war, which so far as we are concerned was waged against the Central Powers of Europe, upon any other ground than the just casus belli which I have mentioned. And yet it will be a source of profound pleasure to the world and to the American people particularly to know that that action inured to the benefit and protection of human rights throughout the earth.

Did you ever think that maybe the Government of the United States was primarily, by its teachings, responsible for the conditions that brought on this great European war? Have you forgotten that we have taught the doctrine of liberty and the equality of all men, and of government resting alone upon the consent of the governed, of equal opportunities and rights to the private citizen?

Have you forgotten that we discarded the doctrine of kings and of nobles and prevented the conferring of titles under the Constitution? That great position which the Government took in the affairs of nations has had its influence. It has influenced political action through all the years since the Constitution was framed. It has mollified by its influence unquestionably the power that Great Britain exercised under her unwritten constitution. It beckoned France to the contest for liberty in a republic against an imperial government. It encouraged the people in every section of the world who were demanding a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. It was a wonderful doctrine to teach to a world benighted in despotism and inured not to citizenship, but to the position of slaves under imperial government for all the centuries.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. KING. Why are we fighting Russia to-day?

Mr. MOON. We are not fighting Russia. I know we have made no declaration of war against her.

Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman interrupted me with his question I believe I was speaking of the influence of the Government of the United States over the nations of the earth. We were teaching the doctrine that every man is an uncrowned king, that he is entitled to equal participation with others under the law and under the Constitution. There was another idea prevailing in a great portion of Europe. Germany was teaching the doctrine of "Kultur," the doctrine that whatever she saw fit to do she had the right to do, without regard to morality, truth, treaty stipulations, or religion.

Those ideas of government—one making for imperialism, with all power of government centered in the emperor, and the other, with all power of government centered in the individual citizen—were antagonistic. They could not forever contend in debate. They must find, finally, a solution on the field of battle. This great European contest was, therefore, a contest of ideas, a contest of two civilizations for the control of the destinies of men. The United States listened with profound interest as she heard the declaration of war by Germany against France. She listened with deep sympathy when Germany, hurling her legions to the gates of Paris, passed over the prostrate form of Belgium in violation of her treaty obligations. She listened when now chaotic Russia, then living under an imperial government, had caught the spark of human liberty and was moving her forces to the defense of the allies. She listened and heard the tread of troops beyond the sea pass down historic highways from the ancient city of the Cæsars to the frontiers where liberty must live or forever perish. We saw the whole world lighting the conflagration of war. We entered it in defense of the rights of American citizenship. We went thither with two millions of men.

The lines of France and Great Britain and Italy were standing solid, receiving the shock of war from the advancing invaders, now receding and now advancing, until the tide of battle was rolled back by the French upon the Marne. We saw the second and third attacks with millions of men in the ranks of war. Then we saw the flag of the Republic cross the seas. We saw it unite her soldiers beneath it with the banners of Great Britain and France and Italy. We saw that onward movement that at last drove the Germans beyond the Rhine, that forced the abdication of the Emperor and the Crown Prince, and stayed not from their fall the tottering thrones of Bulgaria and Austria-Hungary. Under the influence exercised by the mighty power, under the mighty power of the arms of the allies the doctrine of human liberty has advanced over the earth. Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Turkey plead for peace. Democracy triumphs forever over "kultur" and divine right of kings.

Mr. Chairman, it is a remarkable fact that upon that very day when the armistice was signed—November 11, 1918—the British forces operating in the Holy Land having destroyed the power of the Turk and pursued and driven his fleeing legions from Palestine and Syria, that her army quietly, with dignity, moved into the city of the immortal king, the sacred city of Jerusalem. And for what shall it be? The restoration, we trust, of a nation that has been scattered throughout the ages, a nation without a country, without a home, a nation whose sons have been born under every clime, and which in war and in peace has added honor, dignity, and prosperity to the land of the flag to which they adhered. Let us hope that Israel shall be united again and take her stand among the nations of the earth. We would not have the Jews who live in our great cities renounce their native land, or all those in Europe, perhaps, go back to the land of their fathers, but to the millions of Jews in Poland and central Europe and Asia it will prove an asylum of freedom.

Can we not see them as they return to the land of their father, protected against the despotism of Turkey, protected against that despotism even before the power of Turkey was asserted upon the banks of the Jordan? We see the Jews passing from every land in great caravans, going back to the home of their ancestors. Some pass—

> Where Moab's rock a vale infolds,
> Where the aged sire was laid alone
> To slumber while the world grows old.

The tomb of Moses shall be a Mecca. They seek the caves where rest the bones of the progenitors of that great race. Some came by the Sea of Galilee. We see them with their Christian deliverers as they go down the streets of Jerusalem, stop at the market place where once was the house of Peter. They stop where the temple was, where the Christ boy contended with the wise men. They stop and witness the scenes along the highways of that beautiful city. They walk in Gethsemane. They go where Pilate sat in judgment. They go out on the road that led to Calvary, where He who spake as never man spake, bore the cross upon His back and wore a crown of thorns. They go there beholding no more the red crescent banner of the bloody Turk raised in despotism to sustain the creed of the false prophet Mohammed and to sanction murder, crime, and rapine, but behold floating from the very spot where the Son of man died for the redemption of the world the banner of modern Christian civilization, come to restore them to freedom forever. That is what this great war can do and will do for the Jewish people if rightly determined.

Mr. Chairman, my idea of democracy, and the hopes and aspirations of our people, was expressed in part by me in this House on the 9th of April, 1912, in a speech from which I quote as follows:

> Let us rejoice to see the principles of democracy spreading over the earth; I do not mean a partisan democracy, but that great democratic thought that makes the world restless to-day; that great innate force for good that has actuated men in all the ages—the love of freedom, the love of justice; that love that finds for its habitat no particular section, but lives the world over; that great spirit of democracy that whispered words of hope into the ears of men before Aaron was a priest, Moses a prophet, or David a king—ever seeking justice, ever standing for the right—that spirit that survived the chariot wheels of the pagan warrior, the battle-ax of the Romans, the inquisition of the Spaniards, and the cannons of Great Britain; that spirit that has lived to kindle the fires on every altar erected to human liberty, that has opened the doors of every temple where men worship their Creator in obedience to their own consciences; that has loosened the shackles of slaves and placed the crown on the brows of the martyrs to truth; that catches the humble boy by the hand and leads him into the path of rectitude and bids him follow it as the only open way to the pinnacles of immortal fame.
> That spirit, standing under the shadow of the cross, that has echoed the divine proclamation for 2,000 years of "Peace on earth and good will to men"; that directed the hand that wrote the Declaration of Independence and hovered over the cradle of the Republic, may it live until every kingdom shall fall and every empire shall be dissolved, that government in obedience to the will of the governed may arise upon their ruins. Then the nations shall know that it was not the hand of man, but the fingers of God that fixed the stars on the flag of the Republic to light the path of liberty through all the ages to come.
> Has that day dawned?
> Shall the sun of human liberty continue to ascend until it reaches its zenith?

The mighty struggle in Europe is ended. Throne after throne has fallen. May republics arise on their ruins. On Monday, in Paris, there meets the greatest council that ever sat in the world's history. They shall determine, as far as their powers go, not merely the boundaries of Kingdoms and Empires and Republics, but they shall determine those questions that reflect the individual rights and welfare of great nations. And what can they do? We say that Germany must be punished. It is not for us to advise what that council shall do. We say that Germany must be made to pay the cost of the war, that Great Britain shall be indemnified, that the bleeding bosom of France shall be healed, that the tricolors which so gloriously floats over Versailles and Notre Dame to-day shall float forever nestling over Alsace and Lorraine.

We say that Belgium must be restored. If it can be done it should be done. But if the German Empire were sold to-day at the highest market price for every foot of her soil, if all the personal property that belonged to her people were converted into cash, if her 68,000,000 of people were given to slavery for 40 years, she could not compensate the world for the wrongs and injuries that she has done, even though the goddess of stern justice wrote the decree with her hand guided by the angel of mercy nestling at her side. There must be a peace, not of retaliation and revenge. The burden must be laid upon Germany and the German people and all their allies for the sins of their government as far as they can bear it, but Germany can not rightfully be destroyed by the decree of democracy. Her people must be given a government of their own. She may be shorn of her ships, she ought to be prohibited forever from the practice of those methods that would sustain the doctrines of her kultur. She ought to be deprived of her colonies and confined within the borders of her own home government, and given the right to proceed in the world to the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness that we have demanded for the nations of the world.

But what of the United States? What return shall we have for the generous gift of $20,000,000,000 of money to the cause of liberty? What shall we have in return for the blood of "the bravest of the brave" that has been shed under our flag upon foreign lands in the defense of our rights and liberties and in support of the governments of Europe contending against the most imperial dynasties of all the ages? Nothing, nothing! We seek no reward. We ask no indemnity. We shall quietly withdraw the flag of the Republic from the banners with which it has been associated. Let us pray that it shall be returned over the soldiers of the Union without a star dimmed or a stripe tarnished, still the flag uncompromised in foreign lands or at home, that shall ever be the emblem of a great and free people exercising a supreme sovereignty under the Constitution, a sovereignty that must not and will not be impaired by treaty or otherwise, either for peace or for any other purpose. We love peace. We fight and we die for peace. But the peace that come to republics by the will of imperial arbitrators upon any great national issue where we desire to protect the constitutional rights and liberties of our people will not be the peace of freedom. It will be the peace of slavery. When our boys return we shall meet them with a greeting that is worthy of them and their valor; and as they bear our standard back to our shores a hundred millions of American citizens will salute it. The unconquered banner of an unconquerable people. "The flag to liberty given, whose every hue was born in heaven." [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have agreed to the provisions of this bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and which carries in round numbers $360,000,000. In other words, it appropriates for the expenses of carrying on this great service about a million dollars a day.

I think it is rather remarkable that in these times of partisanship the committee was, so to speak, unanimous on most of the provisions of the bill. The new legislation carried covers salary increases or making permanent the increases of a year ago.

The only two items that I recall on which there was a division and on which there probably will be a division when the bill comes up for consideration are the two items of aeroplane service and motor-truck service.

I will not now take the time of the House to discuss the objections to these items. I desire to say a few words in regard to the general postal service for the past year. We have noticed in years before that a great stress has been laid by the administration officials upon the ability to produce a postal surplus. As I pointed out a little more than a year ago, that desire to show a postal surplus went so far as to compile figures that were, if not erroneous, misleading, in the way they were placed, to show a surplus that did not, in fact, exist, and which I established by a Treasury Department statement made pursuant to my request. It wiped out the boasted surpluses of the 1915–16 period. After the detailed statement the whole was embraced in a summary, as follows:

Summary.

(Part 3.)

1912	—$1,575,986.80
1913	+ 2,389,018.12
1915	— 6,724,275.27
1916	— 300,362.22
Net loss 1912–1916	— 3,076,633.11

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 31, 1917.

However, the method of determining a postal surplus is simple. It consists under the law of 1835 of the difference between the audited receipts and the audited expenditures during the fiscal year. Of course, with expenditures and receipts exceeding a million dollars a day it is easy to postpone a few bills at the last end of the year, if you want to show a surplus that does not exist, but its punishment is that you will get a deficit the next year or year after, because these bills must be paid at some time. The practice I do not think has prevailed to any great extent, but the fact that it has been discussed in official reports by the department shows that there has been an exaggerated idea about the merits of a postal surplus. I think it is due to a mistaken idea of what the Postal Service is. The correct theory is that it is a public facility instituted to serve the people; whenever the receipts are not sufficient to pay for the service the rates should be increased, and when the rates are so high as to produce a postal surplus of some magnitude it would be the duty of Congress to either improve the service, make it more expeditious, reliable, and efficient, and improving the conditions of the personnel, the employees engaged in this arduous task of distributing the mails, or reduce the rates of postage. Therefore, it seems to me that a very large surplus or a very large deficit should be avoided.

The largest deficit we have had in recent years was in 1915 when there was a deficit of nearly $12,000,000. Last year and this year the statement shows a considerable surplus. In fact, the difference between the audited receipts and the audited expenditures this year shows a surplus of nineteen and one-half million dollars, a very remarkable showing, especially in view of the fact that the salaries of nearly all the employees were increased. The expense of carrying on the service was also increased, and yet there is a surplus of nineteen and a half million dollars.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. In 1918 the only salaries increased were 10 below $1,000. The letter carriers were not increased with the beginning of July 1, 1918, which would be reflected in the next fiscal year.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman will find that the salaries have been increased for the fiscal year of 1918 from what it was in 1917. Other expenses for carrying on the service increased. The star routes let that year were let at a higher price than formerly. Supplies were purchased at higher prices, and certainly the appropriations were increased, as the gentleman from Texas knows very well. Now, the wages have increased, and the price of supplies having increased all around, it is remarkable that there should be so large a surplus this year, and it is worth while, I think, to consider the reasons.

When I spoke about the increase in compensation of those who render services I did not include one of the most important parts of the service. I refer to the railway transportation. Remarkable as it may seem, the cost to the Government of transportation by rail of mail matter has very greatly decreased, but certainly the decrease has been accentuated very largely since the passage of the space-plan law of 1916, which went into effect November 1 of that year. It includes the whole of the fiscal year of 1918.

Before that law went into effect it was estimated by department officials that the per ton per mile cost of mail transportation, including railway post-office pay, was 10.26 cents. I have computed what it was last year. Now, that computation is based on the most accurate figures that have ever been obtained, for the reason that in the dispute between the railroad companies and the Government as to putting in force the space-plan law there was a general weighing of the mail matter throughout the United States. Formerly there was only a quadrennial weighing. Last year there was a complete weighing of the mail matter throughout the whole United States, all that transported by rail. Of course, some of the mail does not reach the railroad, but if it only traveled by rail a few miles it was included in the weighing. The weighing was continued for 35 days in the spring, and these days are supposed to have the most nearly average volume of mail.

I have figures here showing there was 826,000,000 ton-miles of mail. Of course, we do not usually compute mail by the ton-mile. We all know there are 2,000 pounds in a ton, and if you transmute the ton-miles into pound-miles you would have 1,000,652,000,000 pounds of mail carried 1 mile.

Now, if you simply carried a piece 1 mile. that would indicate the total volume of the mail; but the mail is carried more than 1 mile. It is believed that 400 miles represents the average haul, and some put it as high as 500 miles. If you divide that large sum of pound-miles by 400 we have about 4,225,000,000 pounds as the total weight of the mail that travels by rail.

Of course there is a percentage of mail that does not reach the railroads, and it has been estimated as high as 10 per cent. However, for the purpose of this argument here, I shall not take it into account. If you divide the total amount of railway mail pay as it is now—$53,000,000—by the total number of pounds, you will find that during the fiscal year 1918 the railway mail pay was reduced to 6.4 cents per ton-mile, or, in other words, a reduction of nearly 40 per cent. They show in their reports how many car-miles have been saved. They reduce the service to 60-foot car-miles, and they show that 32,824,260 full 60-foot car-miles have been saved by the economy of placing heavier loads on each car. This "saving," they say, was equal to 15 trains of 10 cars each every day in the year between New York and Chicago. Instead of using the space they authorized—and you will find that on page 101 of the Postmaster General's report they used a less sum—here is their table:

Miles of service per annum prorated to 60-foot car basis:
Nov. 1, 1916	272,794,837.13
June 30, 1918	220,290,652.83
Decrease	52,504,184.30
Per cent of decrease, 19.24.
Total authorized rate of compensation per annum:
Nov. 1, 1916	$64,447,982.47
June 30, 1918	52,022,070.43
Per cent of decrease, 19.28.

How could that be done? As was stated by my colleague on the committee, Mr. MADDEN, it was saved by economy in loading. Instead of using the space authorized, they waited with a car until they could get a full load, and they are paying only for the space; and if they could get two loads on one 60-foot car, they would save one-half. They have actually saved, according to the best figures, between twelve and thirteen millions of dollars on their own basis. I have made a calculation myself from official figures.

I have taken the rate of pay as it was prescribed by the weight law and as they now pay and I find there is a difference of $20,000,000 last year. Perhaps the department's estimate will be $14,000,000, but it is immaterial whether it will be $14,000,000 or $20,000,000. That is a very large reduction, especially in view of the fact that the volume of mail has increased at a greater rate than ever before in the history of the country. Out of the 826,000,000 ton-miles that were transported by railway we know about how much there was of each class. It is desirable that each class should pay its way, and I think they are coming nearer to it now than ever before. This weighing of mail last year is the most complete determination of the total volume of mail that has ever been made. We can approximate the volume of each class. Two years ago the Post Office Department estimated after a sample count in the various offices that there were 1,000,000,000 pieces of parcels weighing nearly 2 pounds each. There has been an increase of probably 14 per cent since, so, too, multiplying the number by average weight of each piece, we get two billions and a quarter pounds. At the estimated income from those at 3 cents a pound, that would bring in some $67,000,000. The second class is paid by the pound, and, of course, it is weighed when it is put into the post office, so that of all mail matter there is no kind whose quantity is so easily ascertained, because all you have to do is to look at the number of cents paid and you have the number of pounds. It amounted to 1,170,000,000 pounds, which is a little more than one-half of the volume of parcels, but it pays only between $11,000,000 and $12,000,000 of revenue. The third class, perhaps, amounts to thirty to thirty-five millions. That embraces small books weighing less than 8 ounces, all circulars, circular letters, and mail matter that really pays quite a good deal of revenue, so I presume there is a profit on that. The first-class mail is the most profitable of all. When mail rates were 2 cents an ounce, it was estimated that it took 45 letters to make a pound—they are so much underweight on the average.

Of course, if they weighed an ounce each, that would be 32 cents a pound, each letter having full weight, but the revenue from the first-class mail runs to about 85 cents a pound, or even as high as 90 cents, the estimates varying. In 1907 they figured it cost 49 cents a pound to transport and handle first-class mail. Of course, everybody knows it is more expensive; everybody knows that it ought to have, if it has not, a more expeditious way of being transported, and, in modern war language, it should be given priority. There are many pieces to the pound, and that fact necessitates a larger clerical force. But even at that they make a profit of about 40 cents a pound. This will, therefore, explain to you why we have a postal surplus this year.

I was about to analyze the reason for the present postal surplus. I have given one in the fact that there is a very large reduction in railway mail pay of 40 per cent of the ton mileage from what it was some years ago before the space plan was inaugurated and because of the economies thereby accomplished. There has been a reduction in pay all of the way from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 in face of the fact that the volume of mail has been constantly increasing at the rate of 4½ to 5 per cent in weight. What is the other cause, if any there be, why the receipts are so large? The receipts were $388,000,000. Of course, you all know that the war-revenue law imposes a 3-cent rate on first-class mail and a 2-cent rate on postal cards, but that was required by that law to be estimated monthly and paid into the Treasury as a war revenue. The Postmaster General has in compliance with that, as he says, estimated it at $44,500,000 for the seven months after the passage of the act, until the end of the fiscal year. That leaves $344,000,000 as the revenue at the old 2-cent rate. It is to be noted that the Postmaster General's report does not credit in any way the war conditions for any of the increase in revenues, but it blames the war for delays in the carrying of the mail. His excuse for slow transportation and for delay in the mail is war, but he never mentions that the great surplus he has produced is very largely due to the war. The detailed report of the department does show these two things. It shows that at the cantonments the first-class mail was enormous.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. If the surplus is due to war conditions, will the gentleman please explain in what way?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am about to do that.

Mr. AYRES. Very well.

Mr. STEENERSON. The war produced an abnormal increase in first-class mail, which is profitable—that is stating it in a very short word—and the details are found in the Postmaster General's report in reviewing these things.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Just wait a minute until I answer the first one. The gentleman must not load me up with two at a time.

Mr. AYRES. Certainly; that is all right.

Mr. STEENERSON. On page 6 he says:

The combined postal receipts derived from the military branch post offices, exclusive of money-order business, approximate $1,000,000 a month, an amount greater than the receipts of a post office serving a city of 2,000,000 population.

Now, that is just here at home. Now, everybody with common sense can understand that when boys are sent away from their homes, from the farms and shops, to serve in the military camps here in the United States that letters will follow and letters will go from them home at a more numerous rate than before, so the war did stimulate first-class business, which shows a profit, as I have shown, of 40 cents a pound. In addition to that, if the gentleman will be patient, the Post Office Department report says that during the last fiscal year, 1918, the mail of our expeditionary forces abroad was not handled by the Post Office Department, except within the United States. All the mails—35,000,000 letters, first-class, and 15,000,000 and 16,000,000 parcels—they say were delivered to the military forces at the port of embarkation. There is no dispute about that; but here, on page 9, I think it is, they go on to say—I will read it:

With the taking over of the mail by the military authorities the Post Office Department was at once furnished with the list of the units in France and the field postal stations with which they are being served. The Army organized a postal corps of 1,885 enlisted men and 115 officers—

And so forth.

So there are 2,000 men who acted as postal clerks in distributing this mail, and consequently the Post Office Department, which received the revenue, was relieved from paying those 2,000 clerks which they would have done if they were not turned over to them by the military authorities.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. STEENERSON. What is on the gentleman's mind?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The military did not take over the Postal Service until nearly the close of the last fiscal year.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. When did the military take it over?

Mr. STEENERSON. It says here the beginning of the fiscal year, June 30, 1917. No; on pages 6 and 7 the report of the department says the military took control June 1, last.

Mr. MADDEN. If my colleague will yield to me, the transportation charges across the ocean were eliminated also?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am coming to that. Now, here is a case where there is stipulated the amount of first-class mail which is profitable, and there is some profit upon the parcels going to foreign countries which are light in weight and pay a very large rate, because they are outside of the average zone. These military transports carried that mail, and they never paid them a cent. Hence you will find that the expense of the foreign mail which goes on ships carrying mail last year was at least $1,000,000 less than it was before. Why? With 2,000,000 soldiers and all the civilians that followed over into Europe, imagine the volume of mail that went across which paid first-class and parcels, and yet the payment for transportation by ships across the ocean was decreased.

If they had been carried under the legal rate on ships going abroad I venture to say it would cost $3,500,000 or $4,000,000 in addition. If we had furnished 2,000 clerks abroad, say, at $1,500 apiece, that would be $3,000,000, and presumably the clerks abroad would have cost $4,000,000. That expense was saved or avoided by the Postal Service, but they got all the revenue. Now, I am speaking of this not in criticism of the Post Office Department, not at all, but I am speaking of it because I want to show you that the large postal surplus of this year is not due to a normal state of business and that it can not be expected to continue in the future. We can not expect to have this enormous volume of domestic first-class and foreign first-class and parcel-post mail after the war ceases, and if it does continue you can expect that the expense thereof will be charged to the Postal Service and not to the War Department. Now, this accounts, more than accounts, for all the surplus. If we take these things into account there would be a deficit of very nearly $20,000,000, in my opinion. But assuming that we will have prosperous times in the future, we may avoid such a loss. Now, with regard to the railway service let me say this: I used to be considered a granger and for many years advocated stringent laws with reference to railroads, and I was sent to the legislature as an antirailroad member, representing the people. I do not believe I have any particular prejudice in favor of railroads. In regard to railway mail pay, I would say I believe it is the correct principle that we should pay for all the service rendered at a compensatory rate, at a fair rate; that you should not compel anybody to work for less than the service is reasonably worth. I do not care whether it is a railroad company or an individual. In the space-plan law we provide a $1,000 fine to any railroad company refusing to carry the mail at the rates prescribed by the Postmaster General, and when we have made a penal offense of $1,000 to refuse to carry this stuff, is it fair for us to turn around and say, "You must carry it for less than it costs you"? Evidently that would not be fair. If the compensation of the railroads by the space plan has decreased 25 per cent it is a question whether in the face of increased operating expenses it is compensatory.

The Government increased railroad freight rates 25 per cent, entailing an extra burden on the people of $600,000,000 per annum, but the freight it ships in the form of mail enjoys a reduced rate. Consequently the small country merchant, whose freight bills are increased, has a harder time to meet his city competitor, who distributes his merchandise by mail and enjoys the same old rates. In 1900, in fact as late as 1901, I think, the proportion of postal receipts paid for railway transportation was 36 per cent. It gradually was reduced until it came down to 21 per cent. In 1915 it was 21 per cent; last year it was 17 per cent of the total receipts.

Statement of total postal receipts and expenditures for railroad transportation of mails, 1900 to 1918, inclusive.

The practice of express companies of paying 50 per cent of receipts has recently been adopted by the United States Railroad Administration. That business is analogous to parcel post, only there is no limit on weight of packages. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], pointed out that there had been delay in the mail. The Postmaster General's report boasts of the number of car-miles that they have saved. If by the economy in loading, as it is said, you can save half the transportation by holding a car until the end of the day, if you thereby delay the letters for New York or Philadelphia one day it is poor economy. You pay the railroad company less, but you do more damage to the business public.

Now, it is not a sporadic complaint that comes to us. It is universal. I venture to say that there is not a Member of this House who has not had complaint about delay in the mail. And the Postmaster General's report seeks to excuse that by war conditions. Ever since the European war began the war has been the goat of the Post Office Department. When there was a lack of revenue, the war was blamed. They never give credit. This war is now blamed for delay in the mail. If a man waits two days to get a letter from Yonkers down to Wall Street, in New York City, they say it is war conditions that are to blame. I received a telegram yesterday from the Merchants' Association of New York, in which they say that they have timed the passage of letters from one part of New York City to the other, and that it took a day and a half or two days.

But I think my colleague on the committee [Mr. MADDEN] hit the nail exactly on the head when he said that it was due to an inordinate desire to economize by loading too heavily under the space plan. They have taken off these thousands of cars, which they say they have saved, and they have had fewer dispatches of mail. Now, that is all right, so far as merchandise is concerned, but it will not do for first-class mail. It seems to me it is strange that the department has not awakened to the fact that this is the cause. They can not have this war to blame forever. It will soon end, possibly. And I think you will find that if they continue to get the mail service from the railroads at the present economic rate, there will be a less quick dispatch than there was formerly. If space plan as operated reduces the pay below a fair compensation it is unjust. If, on the other hand, it delays the mail, it is unwise and expensive. But I almost forgot to say that this saving upon which the department places so much emphasis—the saving in railway mail pay—has not yet been sanctioned. This is a most remarkable thing. They count it as absolutely saved before they know. The space-plan law had a provision to the effect that the existing law for transportation of mail, except as therein modified, shall continue in effect until the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the provisions thereof, fixed a fair and reasonable rate of compensation for such transportation service. And then it goes on and gives them jurisdiction to determine whether the space plan is fair and just and whether the rate prescribed in the space plan is correct or not. And then it provides that, except as the department, for an experiment, puts it into effect, the rates under the old law shall continue. Now, when that was put in there it was supposed they were going to experiment with a small part. A great many people thought it was that, a small part of the railroad. But they put the space plan into effect throughout the whole United States, except on routes that were simply too light in traffic to justify hiring 3-foot compartments. Under the space plan they are divided into 3-foot, 7-foot, 10-foot, 15-foot, 30-foot, and 60-foot space, car length, and where the mail was so light they could not afford to pay even for 3 feet, then they continued it under the old law—under the weight plan. All the routes of the United States are put under the space plan, and they have computed the pay and paid them under the space plan, although the law said it should not take effect until a favorable decision by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, I went down there to get the exact amount they would pay under the space plan. It seems these two plans are in force to-day. "If the Interstate Commerce Commission decides that the space plan is unjust, then what would you pay?" They could not tell me. They know what they have paid.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In reference to the space plan, do they work the mail on the train under that plan?

Mr. STEENERSON. To some extent, but to a very much less extent than they did formerly, because they do not authorize space enough to work it. In fact, Mr. Praeger, I believe, last year, or his man in charge of the Railway Mail Service, said that they have reduced the railway mail clerks by 1,200. They are put in as distributors in the terminals.

Mr. MANN. How do they arrange about local mail that is put on the train at all stations?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, that is not distributed at all. That goes by to some other post office, where they open it and send it back. There has been a great deal of complaint about that. There are a lot of mail cars that have no clerks on, and no mail can be put on such cars.

Mr. MANN. Now, let me ask you a question for information. Take the Illinois Central Railroad, running from Cairo to Chicago. There are a great many stations along the line of the road—post offices. When they put their mail sack on the train is the mail worked on the train?

Mr. STEENERSON. No. It has got to be worked at the starting point and put into a separate sack for each of those small places, and the pouches are thrown off.

Mr. MANN. I am talking about the mail that is put on the train at the small places. Part of the mail goes to Chicago.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think in most cases it goes to Chicago.

Mr. MANN. Part is addressed to Chicago, part is addressed to New York, part is addressed for eastern points, and part addressed to western points. Say, on a train going north, that mail is put on the train. Is that mail worked on the way to Chicago or not worked until it gets to Chicago?

Mr. STEENERSON. I would not be positive about that, although I have been on those mail cars several times since the space plan was inaugurated. But I do know that a great deal less mail is worked in transit than before, because they have not got the space in the cars.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that practically on all railroad lines they have what are called local mail trains, and that on those local mail trains the mail is worked by the postal clerks on the postal cars, although perhaps on the fast through trains that carry mail that is not done?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I have had a great deal of trouble about that kind of a case, where they will not furnish the clerks to work the mail even on those trains. You have got to assort it at the beginning of the route and put it in a separate pouch, and that pouch is thrown out.

Mr. McKENZIE. Pardon me. Suppose I mail a letter at my home town, on the Chicago & Great Western road, 140 miles west of Chicago, and address it to Freeport, Ill., about 35 miles away. My understanding is that that mail sack from my local home town is put on the train and is thrown on the table, and that letter that would be addressed to Freeport, Ill., would be thrown into a sack that would go to Freeport, and so on. It would not be sent to Chicago and sent back.

Mr. STEENERSON. That may be, if they have a clerk to do it. They do not have them on all cars.

The saving by means of the space plan can not be said to be an accomplished fact, for its justice and validity are yet to be determined. An adverse decision might wipe out all this surplus. It is a little premature to count this as an absolute surplus, because we have this contingent liability, depending on the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There is a provision in this bill authorizing, I believe, $2,300,000 for motor-truck service. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the chairman of the committee, explained how enormously profitable the motor-truck service has been. The hearings before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads justifies that statement, and the Post Office Department report justifies it. They made about 80 per cent profit on this motor-truck service. However, upon cross-examination the Assistant Postmaster General admitted that in arriving at the income of the motor-truck service on those routes they counted all the postage. So I asked them if a letter or parcel that came from Manila, say, to Hawaii, and from Hawaii to San Francisco, and from San Francisco to Harrisburg, was put on a route from Harrisburg down to the East, they would count the postage on that as having been earned my the motor-truck service, and he had to admit that that was the case. They count all the postage that all these packages bear, and then they have a system of figuring that easily can be found to be false. I have not the time to go into it, but it stands to reason that it can not be possible that you can make such an enormous profit in carrying parcels if you count all the expense. It may be that there is a day or two or a month or two or three months in a year where you have this profitable business, but there may be months or half a year or more when there is little or no business. And the remarkable thing about this motor-truck service is that they parallel the railroads. They run parallel in most every instance to an existing railroad line, and the railroads, of course, are anxious for business. How is it, then, that by motor trucks you can carry at such a vast profit this business which otherwise would be moved by rail? It may be, but I can not understand it. I have my doubts, and consequently I have my doubts about appropriating this vast sum.

There is another thing that I want to call attention to when we come to discuss that item, that under the provision of a law which was placed as a rider on the Post Office appropriation last year they are furnished trucks for nothing by the War Department. They are turned over free, and, of course, that item of cost does not appear.

Now, under this item they are going to spend $2,300,000, and some say it will be increased to $10,000,000. It is not segregated—so much for automobiles, and so much for this, and so much for operation, and so much for the chauffeurs. Oh, no. It is simply a lump sum, and it includes improvement of roads. It might be all used for the improvement of roads, and it might be all used for automobiles, in the discretion of the Postmaster General. You remember how hard we fought here when we passed the road law. We wanted a correct apportionment. We did not want to trust the discretion of the Postmaster General in distributing the money for roads, and so we made a careful calculation, that was very fair, that was not to discriminate against localities or States. But under this, in these times of war, they say we must confide in the Government, and therefore they give it discretion to build roads wherever they please.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I wish to ask the gentleman about the provision for the improvement of highways, in line 18, page 23, of the bill:

> The improvement of highways, the purchase, manufacture, exchange, and repair of equipment—

And so on. That is a change of existing law. My impression is that those words "the improvement of highways" were slipped in there; that that subject was not before the committee.

Mr. STEENERSON. I can not remember that I heard of that in the committee at all. I was out trying to frame another provision, and perhaps it happened while I was out.

Mr. MOON. That whole paragraph is new.

Mr. STEENERSON. This is a new provision. I have here the committee print which shows exactly what is new. The new parts were printed in italics. I presume it is a new version of a part of an old law:

> For experimental motor-vehicle truck service in such localities of the United States as the Postmaster General may select, the establishment and extension of such service, the improvement of highways, the purchase, manufacture, exchange, and repair of equipment, supervision and maintenance, and expenses incidental to conveyance and marketing of produce and commodities, $1,000,000.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the gentleman contend that the phrase "improvement of highways" was in last year's law authorizing the experiment with motor trucks?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will read the section of the current appropriation act. It is section 7 of last year's appropriation act:

> SEC. 7. That to promote the conservation of food products and to facilitate the collection and delivery thereof from producer to consumer, and the delivery of articles necessary in the production of such food products to the producers, the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to conduct experiments in the operation of motor-vehicle truck routes in the vicinity of such cities of the United States as he may select, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and the cost of such experiments, not exceeding $300,000, may be paid by the Postmaster General out of any unexpended appropriations of the Postal Service, and the Postmaster General shall report the result of such experiments to the Congress at the earliest practicable date.

The gentleman is absolutely right. There is nothing about highways in last year's law. In fact, I did not know it was in there at all until I saw this bill printed; but we have waived all points of order based on the fact that it is new legislation, so that we will have to debate it on the merits when the time comes.

There is another item here that carries $2,185,000 for airplane service. That is in addition to the fact that this law authorizes the War Department to furnish the airplanes for nothing.

Mr. MOON. May I suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that when we removed the airplane proposition from the steamboat proposition, with which it was heretofore connected, by the action of the committee we reduced the steamboat proposition from $245,000 to $185,000 and we did not increase the inland transportation appropriation at all, so that the airplane appropriation now falls under the inland transportation appropriation without any increase whatever in the totals.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is correct.

Mr. MOON. So if it should transpire that a reduction can be made in the use of the money for inland transportation by the use of it for airplanes, there can be nothing lost in that case.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman from Tennessee points out that this appropriation for airplanes is taken out of the appropriation for transportation of mails by railways and that it does not increase the total. It does, however, increase the amount that could be spent for airplanes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If my friend will pardon me, in connection with the airplane proposition I want to ask a question.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I notice here in the airplane proposition an appropriation of $2,185,000, which provides for the purchase of airplanes and the operation and maintenance of the airplane service. I wondered if the committee took into consideration in connection with that matter the possibility of making available the Army and Navy airplanes that probably will go out of actual service when peace is consummated, instead of purchasing them?

Mr. STEENERSON. The committee were aware that the law of last year did authorize the turning over of these airplanes to the Post Office Department, and they were told at the hearing that the department might also purchase airplanes from private manufacturers.

Now, $2,000,000, or nearly $3,000,000, for these two items is a liberal amount for an experiment. I want to call attention to another remarkable thing about automobiles, seeing we are on the automobile subject.

For a great many years the mail in the large cities was transported from the station to the post office and back again by what they called the screen-wagon service. That was a contract service. Two or three years ago it was abolished, and automobiles owned and operated by the Government were substituted. Part of the service in the cities was also performed by underground tubes. The service performed by the tubes was similar to that which was performed by the screen-wagon service. That is, it transported the mails between the station and the post office. The amount required when the Government had these contracts was $2,300,000.

This year we appropriate $6,700,000. There has been an increase of nearly 300 per cent in the cost of transporting the mail in the cities. Why should that be? The Post Office Department tells us that they have accomplished a wonderful saving this year. My colleague, Mr. MADDEN, has asked several times how it could be that they claimed such a saving last year. They said we are saving because we asked for no more this year than we asked last year, and there has been a growth in the mail service. We passed the bill, and then they went over to the Senate and had it increased $735.000. So automobiles seem to be in favor, although the expense of transporting the mail in the cities has increased nearly 300 per cent in three years, or at least 250 per cent, and they still say that they are saving us a large amount. They say that they are going to save us millions by the motor-truck and automobile, and other millions are going to be saved with great expedition of the mail by aeroplanes.

I may be of a suspicious nature, but it looks to me as though the automobile industry, which everybody knows is a great combination, having the most complete organization in every State in the Union, beyond that of any other manufacture or mercantile branch in the world, have great influence in this matter. They hold conventions, good-roads meetings, and put through constitutional amendments seeking to appropriate millions and millions of dollars of the States in order to build roads upon which joy riders can ride from Chicago to Frisco. Of course they do not reach the backwoods in my district with their fine macadam roads that cost $20,000 a mile, but they are doing a good work no doubt for roads, and they do good work for the automobiles. They are selling automobiles by the million, and they certainly have a good customer in Uncle Sam. He buys all the automobiles, and they are used up in three or four years, and yet the expense of this item is enormously increased.

Evidently they propose to wipe out the railroads altogether, because the motor-truck routes are paralleling the railroads. They say they can do it for about one-fifth. At least they do it for one-fifth of the postal revenue, as they figure.

It must be that the Post Office Department intends to supplant railroads by motor trucks, and, as the gentleman from Tennessee said, they may in time be prepared to carry a 1,000-pound parcel-post package. Instead of having railroads we will have motor-truck routes with steel-surface highways. Evidently there is a movement on the part of the automobile industry, which includes the aeroplane industry and the Oil Trust, to wipe out every other kind of transportation. They have wiped out the underground transportation in New York City and substituted automobiles, thereby selling new ones, and they now propose to wipe out the railroads, because they can get automobiles from the War Department, and no railroad can compete with them.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am much interested in the matter of motor transportation. Can the gentleman say whether in the estimate of the cost of transportation the amount of depreciation and loss caused by the upkeep and subsequent casting aside of the automobile has been fairly taken into consideration?

Mr. STEENERSON. I think the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General has covered everything. If he has not, he will; he is the most expert talker I ever listened to, and if he can not explain it nobody on earth can. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. How about his figures?

Mr. STEENERSON. I have not had time to analyze them, but I wish the gentleman from Iowa, who is on the Ways and Means Committee, would take hold of Mr. Blakslee's figures. I am afraid if he did there would not be much left. As it is, he proved before the committee that, like Col. Sellers, there were "millions in it; millions in it." That is the way the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General talked about motor trucks. Evidently he wants to wipe out transportation by railroads, and the motor-truck manufacturers are with him. They are going to do it not only by means of that sort of transportation, but by aeroplane transportation.

Well, although I was the first man to ever offer an appropriation of $50,000 for the experiment in aeroplane transportation of mail, I have not gone wild over the idea. I asked them when they were going to have it out in St. Paul and Minneapolis, in my State. They said in the spring. I did not want my territory to be overlooked. Minneapolis, for instance, and St. Paul can have their letters mailed in the evening at 7 or 8 o'clock and at 9 o'clock in the morning or 10 o'clock in the morning they are in Chicago. That is almost as good as transportation by aeroplanes, because people would not be up during the night and the mail would not be delivered.

Mr. MOON. Then the gentleman would not want the more expeditious service out there, would he?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say to the gentleman that I have not finished yet. [Laughter.] I do not think it will amount to anything; but besides the aeroplane mail we have the telegraph. We can telegraph in a few hours if we could have as good service as we had before the war, but the war has disorganized everything in the way of telegraph service, so that service is not as good as it used to be. But if we have normal times I could telegraph Chicago and get an answer back in an hour. If you do not want to do that, you could telephone. You could telephone from Milwaukee at a reasonable rate, and I can not see any very urgent necessity for carrying mail by aeroplanes between these points. Yet if the rest of the country is going to have this spectacular service—this great means of advertising the department worthy of George Creel—we want it in Minnesota.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I note what the gentleman said about efficiency and the figures of the department, especially of the Fourth Assistant. Does the gentleman think the efficiency found in this department would warrant the Government in buying the telegraph and telephone lines so as to extend opportunities for efficiency in the Post Office Department?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 1 hour and 15 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall undertake to answer the question of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN], although I had not intended to discuss that feature. If he desires to have my view upon it, I shall be very glad to give it.

Mr. SLOAN. I certainly desire it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] upon that point with great attention. I thought at one time he was going to decide against Government operation of both telephone and telegraph and the railroads. He cited the Constitution as thoroughly as any constitutional lawyer could, with great emphasis. In my view, there never was any constitutional question about this matter. I do not believe anyone can raise a question of whether the United States has the power and authority under that clause of the Constitution granting it power to establish post offices and post roads, to own and operate telephones and telegraphs. I believe they can, and it was quite unnecessary for the gentleman from Tennessee to convince me it was constitutional. Moreover, I will say this, that in the nature of things communication by telephone and telegraph is very similar to communication by letter, and therefore there is nothing inherent in the difference that would preclude the Government from performing one function as well as the other. I believe in Government ownership and operation of a public utility like this whenever it appears likely that the public will thereby be served more efficiently and economically, but whether this will prove true as to any or all of these telephone and telegraph companies is a question that ought to be carefully considered.

If there exists a valid objection it is not founded on constitutional grounds. The gentleman from Tennessee, in pursuing the subject, did come very near to the real point of objection. While I should like and I hope to see some day when the Government shall operate the Postal Service, including the telegraph and telephones, with efficiency and without partisanship or politics, without carrying on a publicity campaign throughout the year to make things true that are not true, advertising surpluses that do not exist—if it should become a business institution free from politics—then I think I should like to see that department carry on this other activity.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman will excuse me until I have finished. There is another objection, not founded upon the ability of the Government to do the business, not founded upon the Constitution, but founded on the same objection that exists to assuming the numerous functions of railway transportation and various other things that we have been doing during the war. I said the gentleman from Tennessee came very near pointing out the objection, but he did not pursue it to its final logical conclusion. The real objection to assuming all these activities at this time lies in the fact that it is dangerous to free institutions. [Applause.] History and logic and science all tell us the reason why there is and must be a difference between the organizations of society in a militant state and in a peaceful state. The problem of republics has always been to develop military capacity without developing the military spirit; in other words, without becoming an autocracy or a despotism. I think one of the greatest accomplishments of any people in the world was what the American people did in organizing for war. It was not only an organization that was compelled and required by law, but an organization inspired by voluntary effort upon the part of the people.

A military organization depends upon rank. There is a regimentation from the common soldier to the sergeant, to the lieutenant, to the captain, and so on up to the general and commander in chief. One head must control it in order to make it efficient and hurl it at the enemy. It has been the history of the world that no industrial society organized upon liberal principles could be efficient in war. This has been thrown up against us always, and against a republican form of government, because of inefficiency in war. You have not got the organization.

De Tocqueville, in his Democracy in America, says:

> All nations which have been obliged to sustain long and serious warfare have consequently been led to augment the power of their government. Those who have not succeeded in this attempt have been subjugated. A long war always reduces nations to the wretched alternative of being abandoned to ruin by defeat or to despotism by success.

It was fortunate for us that we were not called into battle instantly, because over there the allies held the fort while we were coming for a year or more. We had in that time an opportunity to change from the peaceful, industrial, mercantile society into a militant society. Hence Congress was asked to confer these powers upon the President, and we readily, without regard to party, showered these powers upon him, almost buried him. The President has still to do this and to do that. As a matter of fact, he has to depend upon hundreds of thousands of agents whom he never sees to do these things. That was necessary and proper. I think it is Ferraro, in his work on militarism, that lays down this rule, that where militarism is developed to its highest point, there the army is the people mobilized, while in time of peace the people are the army quiescent. It is so complete that it only requires notice of conflict to become a military machine.

I once read an article, written by a man whose name I have forgotten, on the life of Lincoln—a very thoughtful article—and in it he mentioned this doctrine about militarism; and he says that the example of Washington, followed by the example of Lincoln, after engaging in the Revolutionary War and in the Civil War, the American people following their lead and laying down a military organization and becoming an industrial and peaceful community was the most wonderful thing in history. If the American people look upon that as a lodestar to follow, then our institutions will be safe. If, on the other hand, the same thing should happen here as happened in the ancient States of Greece and Rome, and we continue a military organization, a complete unit of command, then popular government will be destroyed. In comparatively modern times we have Napoleon as an example. He was elected first consul, but after he had engaged in those wars and had his armies complete, then what was the use of having an election? There was not a Pope good enough to crown him. He was the autocrat supreme, and he placed the crown on his own head. There you have autocracy grown out of militarism. Have we not these lessons before us? The army was the controlling power. Have we not the lessons on this continent to the south of us, coming where military despotism has prevailed? The danger of assuming the telegraph, the telephone, and the railroad systems consists, as suggested, in the installation of an army of millions of men whose tenure of office and whose compensation are dependent upon the party in power.

If you have three or four or five million Government employees, with their friends, how long will it be before, by increase of salary or promise of increase, a President can perpetuate himself, either in his own person or in the person of his son-in-law or some other relative? I say that there never was a greater menace to the very foundations upon which our Government rests—popular, representative government—than in the piling up of these Government activities, however efficiently those activities may be performed. It is not a question whether the Government can perform these activities; it is a question of what becomes of your country. If we disregard the sanctified example of George Washington, who laid down his power to go back to his farm; if we disregard the glorious example of the immortal Lincoln, who had an army larger than any Caesar or Napoleon ever had; if we do not follow the advice of Grant that the people go back to their farms, where they will need their horses for their spring plowing, and assume peaceful occupations, but proceed to install millions and millions of Government employees by virtue of the perpetuation of the conditions which existed during the war, then it necessarily must follow that any man who reaches the presidential chair can, if he so desires, perpetuate his office, and the voice of the people will be overcome.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. STEENERSON. I was just answering the gentleman's question. [Laughter.] I will yield, although the answer is not complete.

Mr. SLOAN. Just at that point, in the matter of granting that power, this control and ownership, what does the gentleman have to say about the other countries that have exercised this function? Do not they generally deprive the public officials, the servants who do this work, of the right of franchise before assuming the power?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not know.

Mr. SLOAN. They do; they say in some of the European countries——

Mr. STEENERSON. But they have a more complete and developed civil-service system. In nearly all foreign countries they have a civil-service system that is as nearly as possible free from politics, and we have not as yet. We hope to have it some day, but have not as yet. Government is growth and development, and I do not believe we can expect to have such a civil-service system for some time. If we had it now and it was so that these employees who are proposed would not interfere with politics and destroy the very institutions upon which our Government rests, I would not object. In itself it seems very meritorious, but there is another thing——

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. MOON. If I gathered from the gentleman correctly, he not only does not doubt the constitutional power but he thinks it would be a proper thing provided we can administer the matter properly?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is it exactly. I think the gentleman from Tennessee agrees with me somewhat if there was no danger.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Let me say one word before I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. I want to say that war brings many evils, and among others is the evil of profiteering, and I believe that the man who unduly profits by war conditions, whether in manufacturing or in commerce or otherwise, that the war profiteer is the most despicable person on the face of the earth. [Applause.] But worse than he, I say, is the man in power who by reason of war conditions tries to embezzle the power given him by reason of war conditions and will not disgorge them after the war is over. [Applause.] I say when you give me the power because of war, and when the reason for it is over and I seek to make it impossible, I am not acting in good faith; it constitutes an embezzlement of power which is worse than profiteering. [Applause.] Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true under private ownership of telephone lines, or telegraph lines for that matter, all persons can use them to their fullest extent and to their utmost desire? Now, what is to be gained by Government ownership?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I will say to the gentleman that he has omitted one main reason which he ought to advance.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is what I would like to know.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is when you intrust your message in a hot campaign to the Western Union or the Postal Telegraph Co. or the telephone company you know that they are in duty bound to keep it secret, and if you have Government employees politically influenced, where are you? Are they not going to disclose in a secret way the very message upon which your election depends, or will they not refuse to transmit or delay the message until the occasion for it has gone? There is a vast danger in partisan manipulation of telephone and telegraph services which we must weigh before we determine that question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But aside from war time and political campaigns, when we are having normal times I would like to know whether there is any advantage, and if so what the advantage is, in having public ownership, if there be any?

Mr. STEENERSON. If I have not spoken in vain, the gentleman appreciates there can be efficient service under both, and I have not said one was going to be very much more efficient than the other.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is what I wanted to hear.

Mr. STEENERSON. The bonds and stocks of these wire companies, I am told, are over $2,000,000,000; the revenue about $415,000,000 annually. There are over 20,000 farm telephone companies. There are 927 reporting to the Interstate Commerce Commission of over $50,000 annual receipts. There are 9,585 smaller companies that filed reports. The employees number hundreds of thousands. Just why cooperative farm telephone lines should be seized by the Government as a war necessity no one understands. Is it simply to carry out a fixed desire without consulting the people? I will insert an address on rural telephones in Europe, by G. Odell, that is very instructive.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. Then, one of a somewhat cautious or suspicious nature like myself might infer from what the gentleman says that the management of the Post Office Department has not been entirely devoid of politics during the last five or six years?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I do not believe I can answer that. I take for absolute verity the statement made from this rostrum that politics were adjourned, and consequently I must decline to go into any details.

Mr. SLOAN. As I understand, the gentleman does that personally, but the gentleman does not assume to do it for the House, because some of us might not entirely agree.

Mr. STEENERSON. I am willing to assume politics is adjourned when it is announced it is adjourned.

Mr. SLOAN. Did that apply over here on Capitol Hill or Palatine Hill, at the other end of the Avenue?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I decline to be drawn into a discussion of that. How much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used an hour and 35 minutes this time, and the Clerk informed the Chair that the gentleman had used 40 minutes the other day, whereas the Clerk now says he used 45 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I used 40 minutes, which was given to Mr. MADDEN. I now yield the floor. [Applause.]

TELEPHONES IN EUROPE.

[From an address by Frank G. Odell, executive secretary National Conservation Congress, Dec. 8, 1916.]

Public ownership in theory is one thing. The actual working of public ownership is quite another thing. The future of any great and necessary public utility under public ownership can only be properly forecasted by a survey of what has actually been done where it has been tried for years. Such has been the effort of the writer. It is hoped that this paper will present new and important facts for the consideration of the reader.

SCARCITY OF RURAL TELEPHONES ABROAD.

Remarkable as it may seem, the rural telephone service of those countries which have public ownership is developed to so limited an extent that it seems to be considered unworthy of notice in the official reports of most of such countries. Great Britain is the only exception to this rule. In this country a special effort has been made for the eight years prior to the present war to extend the telephone into the country districts. This effort is consecutively noted in several recent reports of the British postmaster general under the heading, "Rural party lines—Farmers' lines."

The extent to which this effort has succeeded is shown by the total of such telephones in service at the date of the last official report (Mar. 31, 1915), namely, 2,265. This represents 1 telephone for each 4,290 of British rural population in the United Kingdom, as compared with a rural telephone in the United States of 1 for each 10 of population—or 1 telephone for each alternate family.

FARM TELEPHONES IN ENGLAND.

This remarkable development of the farm telephone in Great Britain—remarkable for its conspicuous failure to develop—is more noteworthy, because it is based on a very reasonable rate, to wit:

If the line connects three subscribers to the mile, each subscriber per year $14.61
If the line connects two subscribers to the mile, each subscriber per year 17.05

When the efforts of the British post-office department, offering as low as this, can only secure 2,265 farmers as telephone users in eight years in all of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland there must be something wrong in the British system.

Some of these inherent defects may be found in the interminable delay in securing installation of service, such as that noted by Hon. Mr. Goldsmith of the British parliamentary telephone committee, who called attention in a parliamentary debate on this subject to the fact that nine farmer applicants in Cornwall were still waiting for their telephones after a lapse of three years from the filing of their applications.

When it is considered that the applicant for service in Great Britain must pay full rental for a year in advance, the state of mind of these Cornish farmers may be better imagined than described.

It is generally conceded that the British post office is the most efficient in the world. It should be, therefore, especially competent to work out the experiment of public ownership. The obligation to do this rests peculiarly upon the British Government for the reason that the courts of that country have decided that "A telephone is a telegraph under the telegraph acts of 1863 and 1869, although the telephone was not in existence or contemplation when those acts were passed.

The telephone system of the United Kingdom shows a deficit for the last year reported (1914–15) of $540,657, while the deficit in telegraph operations for the seven years preceding 1914 amounts to $30,659,444. Similar conditions as to losses in operation are to be found generally in the reports of government-ownership countries.

EUROPEAN PERCENTAGES OF DEVELOPMENT.

The rarity of rural telephones in Great Britain and continental Europe is worthy of more than passing notice. In order to make even the discouraging financial showing which is characteristic of publicly owned utilities abroad, it is necessary to develop the service in urban districts. This is indicated by the facts as to percentages of telephone development.

The city of Paris alone has 32 per cent of all the telephones in France; Vienna has 37 per cent of all the telephones in Austria; and Brussels has 37 per cent of all the telephones in Belgium. Rural development has been strangled for the sake of immediate revenue, which is in itself insufficient to develop the districts served on modern lines, so that there is complaint all along the line.

Germany prides itself on taking care of its farmers, but after a 10-year struggle for revision of telephone rates, in which the Government admitted frequently that small communities were unjustly discriminated against, all efforts proved futile and the old rates stand. Consequently the farm telephone is practically unknown in Germany, and no mention of this class of service is to be found in the official reports of that country.

Official statistics show that in the United States the rural telephone rate averages from one-third to one-half the urban rate. In foreign countries the rural rate is generally nearly as high as the urban rate. The inevitable tendency of this condition is to retard rural telephone development by making rural costs approximately city costs.

GOVERNMENT-OWNERSHIP RESTRICTIONS.

In addition to this, government-ownership countries usually impose burdensome line and service charges, still further hampering rural development. This is aptly illustrated by the following quotation from the report of the government-ownership committee of the Farmers' National Congress:

"Government restrictions on rural telephone service: Foreign telephone rate schedules, as generally quoted, do not indicate what the subscriber in rural districts actually has to pay for his telephone service. In addition to the scheduled rates there are extra charges based upon the length of the subscriber's line. In France, for example, the Government furnishes free of charge only that portion of a rural telephone line which is located within 1¼ miles of the exchange.

The contribution toward the cost of construction is at the rate of $3.86 per 110 yards of line (metallic circuit). The annual contribution toward maintenance costs is at the rate of 39 cents per 110 yards of line (metallic circuit). The scheduled rates for local (exchange) service in rural districts consist of an annual subscription, or "ready to serve," charge which allows no outward calls and a charge of 2 cents for each outward call. The annual subscription ("ready to serve") charge varies as follows:

First year $19.30
Second year 15.44
Third year 11.58
Fourth and subsequent years 7.72

When the additional line charges are taken into consideration, it is therefore evident that in order to secure telephone service the French farmer who lives 3 miles from a telephone exchange must pay as follows:

First year, $138.30, plus 2 cents per outward local call.
Second year, $26.36, plus 2 cents per outward local call.
Third year, $22.50, plus 2 cents per outward local call.
Fourth and subsequent years, $18.64, plus 2 cents per outward local call.

The rate of 2 cents per outward call by itself would appear to make the cost of rural telephone service in France prohibitive. An average of three outward calls per working day, or, say, 900 outward calls per year, entails a charge as great as the average cost of complete telephone service in the United States. Moreover, the contributions toward the cost of construction and the annual maintenance costs of subscribers' lines can not be divided among adjacent rural subscribers.

The independent form of farmers' cooperative or joint stock telephone associations, which is common in the United States, is unknown under Government ownership in Europe and is probably impossible under existing forms of governmental administration in European countries.

EXPERIENCE OF SWISS FARMERS.

In 1910 the Swiss Government made a detailed inquiry into the telephone rates of that country. While this inquiry was in progress the farmers of Switzerland thought it an opportune time to register a vigorous protest against the high line charges which the Government imposed upon them—for in Switzerland, as in France, a rural subscriber must pay extra for that portion of his line which is beyond 1¼ miles from the exchange.

Acting at what appeared to be the psychological moment, the Swiss Farmers' Association earnestly requested the Government to abolish these extra line charges. In the report on the results of its rate inquiry the Government dismissed the request of the farmers' association in the following language:

"The abolition of the extra charges for the portions of subscribers' lines beyond the free radius (1¼ miles from the exchange), as required by the Swiss Farmers' Association, is made impracticable by important considerations. For one thing, such a measure is quite inopportune at the present time, when the question is to add to the revenues of the telephone administration by increasing certain of the rates.

"To show the importance of the request it may be mentioned that in the year 1909 the revenue from line charges amounted to about 445 000 francs ($89,000). If these line charges are abolished the consequent loss in revenue must be offset by a further increase in the annual subscription charges of about 15 francs ($3). * * * Such a large general rate increase in the interests of a relatively small number of subscribers can not be approved. * * * One can not ask the administration to construct especially costly lines in the interest of a few subscribers unless correspondingly more revenue is received from them." (Supplementary report of the Federal council to the committee of the national council on the "Proposition to increase telephone rates," Mar. 21, 1911.)

It is not surprising, therefore, that the rural-telephone development in Switzerland is so small that it is not deemed worthy of special classification in official reports of that country.

FRANCE'S RURAL TELEPHONES.

The logical effect of burdensome regulations of this nature is aptly illustrated by a brief study of the rural telephones in France.

Like Switzerland, Germany, and other European countries, rural telephones are not specifically noted in the French reports. One may search them in vain for any clue to what is being done by the Government of France to carry the science of communication to the farmer's door.

This is not to suggest that the French Government is neglectful of the farmer, for it is not. The French farmer was borrowing money on 70 years' time at 3 and 4 per cent interest before half the American States were admitted to the Federal Union. Agriculture has been one of the greatest concerns of the French Government. One has but to reflect how her peasants paid the German war indemnity after the war of 1870 by the creation of the beet-sugar industry to understand that the Government of France is not neglectful of the farmer.

But in France, as in other European countries, the telephone, like the telegraph, is of necessity a Government monopoly, in order to have all means of rapid communication under control of the Government for military purposes. When Napoleon the Great developed the optical telegraph, he set in motion a train of militaristic influence which will never cease on the Continent until world peace is assured by the new brotherhood of man.

The writer was so fortunate as to secure access to a telephone directory of France of the year 1914, listing in one volume, about the size of the Chicago telephone directory, every telephone subscriber in the French Republic outside the exchange area of Paris. This made possible a concentrated study of rural-telephone development.

RURAL DEVELOPMENT COMPARISONS.

For this purpose the Department of Aisne, in northern France, was selected, having a population of nearly 520,000. This department was prior to the war the best-developed agricultural district of the Republic. Any statistical results attained from this study will, therefore, be exceedingly favorable to the French rural telephone system as a whole.

Every telephone subscriber in this district was counted and carefully tabulated, segregating those engaged in agricultural pursuits. This district was then compared with the strictly rural county of Custer, in central Nebraska, which has approximately the same geographical area. The results of this comparison are shown in the following table:

Comparison of telephone in rural districts in United States and France.

	Department of Aisne.	Custer County, Nebr.
Area in square miles	2,860	2,588
Population	518,991	25,688
Total telephones	4,212	4,077
Number of telephones per 100 population	0.81	15.88
Number farmers' telephones	452	2,527

Without taking into consideration the difference in population, Custer County has almost six times as many farmers' telephones as the Department of Aisne. In proportion to population, Custer County, Nebr., has nearly twenty times the number of telephones in the Department of Aisne.

The foregoing examples illustrate the way in which rural telephone development is strangled in Europe. They might be extended in the experience of practically every European country. To the student who desires to base opinion on ascertained facts these examples are a revelation of the limitations which inhere in the bureaucratic methods of Old World civilization.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, there are some important tables in the report of the committee, and I ask unanimous consent that the report (No. 849) of the committee, which is very brief, be printed in the RECORD, and also a letter from the Postmaster General in reference to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request is granted. There was no objection.

The committee report is as follows:

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in presenting the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, submits the following:

The appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, were $361,477,577. The estimates of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, including all revisions of estimates, amount to $368,782,577. The committee recommends appropriations to the amount of $359,657,577.

The appropriation for aeroplane mail service has been transferred from the item "Steamboat and other power-boat service" to that of "Inland transportation by railroad routes," and by a proviso to the latter item the Postmaster General is authorized to expend not exceeding $2,185,000 for the purchase of aeroplanes and the maintenance of aeroplane service, an increase of $1,885,000 over the amount of $300,000 originally estimated by the department for this service.

In the item for "Village delivery service," office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, the committee recommends an appropriation of $1,250,000, an increase of $530,000 over the estimate of the department.

This appropriation also covers the new provision in the bill for delivery service to communities adjacent to cities having city-delivery service.

In the item "Experimental motor-truck service," office of the Fourth Assistant, the act of June 2, 1918, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, authorized an expenditure of not exceeding $300,000 out of any unexpended appropriations for the Postal Service, for the maintenance of motor-truck service. The committee recommends an appropriation of $1,000,000 for this service, an increase of $700,000 over the estimate of the Post Office Department.

The appropriations in this bill are, of course, fixed on the basis of existing law and not on the amount of increases allowed in the last bill in addition to the regular appropriations. If the provisions of sections 2 and 3 of this bill are adopted by the House, then the appropriations herein provided must be increased. To meet the requirements of these sections would add, in some instances, 15 per cent and in other instances 20 per cent of the salaries to the total appropriations. There is an increase, as shown in the bill, in the salaries of fourth-class postmasters and a 50 per cent increase in the appropriation to cover the cost of clerical service in post offices of the third class.

The salary increases herein provided for are made permanent law, and the days set aside by the President to be observed as holidays by the other departments of the Government are also made holidays within the meaning and intent of the postal laws, and postal employees performing service on such holidays will be granted either compensatory time or pay for overtime.

There is a very clear necessity for a reclassification and readjustment of the salaries of all postal employees on a just basis, and in order that the necessary information may be obtained and a proper basis recommended, the third section of this bill provides for a commission for that purpose, consisting of five Members of each House of Congress.

The report of the Postmaster General sets forth the use of the money heretofore appropriated and the revenues to be expected and expended during the coming fiscal year. It shows that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the revenues of the Post Office Department exceeded the expenditures to the amount of $19,626,774.08 after deducting all losses.

The following tables set forth by items the appropriations for 1919, the estimates of the Post Office Department for 1920, and the committee recommendations for 1920 in the office of the Postmaster General and the four assistants, and also the total of all appropriations for the Postal Service for 1919, the estimates of the Post Office Department for 1920, and the recommendations of the committee for 1920:

The letter referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 12, 1918.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: I have just read a copy of the bill (H. R. 13308) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and wish to state that the bill in the form as reported by your committee has my general approval. In some instances I feel that the salaries provided are not sufficient, and in other cases are possibly too high; but inasmuch as section 3 provides for a commission to investigate the salaries of postmasters and employees with a view to their reclassification and readjustment on an equitable basis, this matter can be taken care of by the commission. In addition I wish to express to you my appreciation of the prompt action of the committee in reporting the bill and the consideration which has been given the recommendations of the department in framing it.

Very sincerely,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. MOON. I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the able speech of our honored chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, Mr. MOON, of Tennessee. I think it will be generally conceded that he made a very strong argument in support of the contention that the Federal Government would have the power, so far as any constitutional objections are concerned, to purchase the telegraph and telephone companies and to operate them as a public utility.

He made a very able presentation of that phase of the question, and I doubt if any Member of the House, certainly not many of us, would take issue with him upon that proposition. But I noticed that he did not devote much of the time of his speech to a discussion of the feasibility and the practicability and the propriety of the Government going into the telegraph and telephone business. His lack of argument on that all-important phase of the subject was conspicuously absent. If I understood the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee correctly, and I think I did, because I listened to it with close attention and much interest, he espoused the cause of the Government ownership of the telegraph and telephone lines and he opposed the Government ownership of the railroad companies. In other words, the able gentleman has adopted the idea of catching us "goin' and comin'"; of arguing that the world is flat and also admitting at the same time that it may be round. Of course, if he chooses to adapt his logic to those kinds of processes I have no objection. Now, the able gentleman undertakes to argue that the telegraph facilities and the telephone facilities are necessarily a part of the Postal Service. I take issue against him on that view.

I can not see any reason why the telephone business, for example, should be classed as a postal facility. I can not see that the telephone business has any more connection with the Post Office Department than the motor truck is necessarily a part of railroad transportation or that the aeroplane is indispensably connected with steamship service. Telephone communication is an entirely different matter to communication by letter through the Postal Service, and to my mind it is an absurd contention that the two are inseparably connected with each other. And I doubt if there is very much more similarity as to the telegraph business, though I will admit that there would be greater reason for arguing the latter proposition than there would be the former, so far as abstract logic is concerned.

Now, in the discussion of this question, gentlemen, I want to pause long enough to say that I have no sympathy with the argument that is frequently made by certain gentlemen who have never builded anything themselves and who have nothing to their credit in the way of constructive achievement that the American business man is an inefficient business man. [Applause.] I submit, gentlemen, that if it had not been for the aid of the wonderful organization of American business and the magnificent accumulation of capital which American citizens have been accumulating for 140 years, the enormous sums of money necessary to carry forward our part of the war to victory could not have been raised. Indeed, we have not only been able to finance our own very heavy expenses, but we have been able to finance our allies—England, France, Belgium, Italy, and Russia—to the extent of about $8,000,000,000, and without which they would have been unable to go on with their part of the titanic struggle. So when the historian comes to write the history of the great war he will not overlook the part which American business and American finance contributed, along with America's other splendid efforts, to its success. When these gentlemen who advocate the Government ownership of railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines point out to you the great progress the Postal Service has made—and I am glad to concede everything to which it is entitled—we can also point to the fact that America has admittedly the greatest railroad system in the world, incomparably the greatest, which has been built up by private initiative right alongside of the Postal Service under Government ownership. Indeed, when we pause to make a comparison of the two, we are compelled to admit that much of the success and efficiency of the Postal Service has been due to its use of the transportation facilities furnished by the railroads under private ownership. Those of us who pride ourselves on our excellent Postal Service, and we all do that, can also pride ourselves on the fact that the United States has the greatest telegraph and telephone system in all the world, and it has been built up under private ownership right along by the side of the Postal Service.

Why, gentlemen, we are continually being cited to some European country for the purposes of comparison to similar enterprises here. Ask gentlemen who have visited those countries, who have experienced the services of their public utilities, ask them which is the most efficient and satisfactory service. I have never heard anyone yet who has had the actual experience of using these European utilities but that admitted our American service is the best. "The proof of the pudding is the eating thereof." Members of the House will recall that at the last session of Congress there was a bill introduced to acquire the telephone system in the District of Columbia, and the Committee on the District of Columbia submitted a report in which they purported to make certain comparisons of telegraph rates in Europe with telegraph rates in the United States. The following table was submitted:

	Distance in miles.
Europe, average	$0.12	$0.12	$0.12	$0.24
United States	.25	.30	.50	1.00

That comparison, on its face, would seem to make a good showing for European government ownership of telegraph lines, but it does not tell the whole story. It is my information that in Europe every word in the address, name, date, signature, and so forth, is charged for, as well as every word in the body of the message. I also understand that the name, address, date, and signature contain an average of 14 words in addition to the 10 words, more or less, of the body of the message. In the United States these 14 words go free. In Europe they are charged for. I submit the following table, which takes into consideration that fact:

Average charge for a domestic or intrastate telegram containing 10 text words.

Norway	.32
Sweden	.32
New Zealand	.24
Great Britain	.30
Germany	.28
Italy	.25
Denmark	.32
Austria	.29
United States	.25 to .30

The above rate at 25 cents or 30 cents for telegrams in the United States is between two points in the same State, the distance being about the same as between two points in any of these foreign countries. When we come to telegrams in the United States for longer distances the only comparison with European rates is a comparison with telegrams in Europe between different countries, on account of the long distances traveled by the average long-distanced telegram in the United States. For instance, the United States has 3,026,789 square miles and Great Britain only 121,400 square miles, or 4 per cent of that of the United States. Here is an instance of a comparison of these long-distance telegraph messages. For example, from Paris to Vienna is about 650 miles, and the cost of a 10-word message plus the address and signature, charged for, is 96 cents, as against only 40 cents, address and signature free, for a similar distance in the United States. From Stockholm to Paris, 1,000 miles, the rate for a 10-word message, the address and signature charged for, is $1.20. From New York to Chicago, about the same distance, the rate for a 10-word message, address and signature free, is 50 cents. There are many other advantages of the telegraph system in the United States which I might mention. Our telegraph companies here in this country send messengers to collect telegrams, keep open accounts for their customers, keep offices in hotels, apartment houses, and in many other ways offer competitive accommodations to their customers. It is my information that in European countries where the Government owns the telegraph lines they do nothing of the kind. I submit these figures and comparisons upon the basis of a statement issued by Mr. Edward Reynolds, vice president and general manager of the Postal Telegraph Cable Co., on April 16, 1918. I have never heard their accuracy challenged by anyone and I assume that they are correct.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Has the gentleman any table to show the comparative time it takes to send a message in those comparative areas in the different countries? For instance, the one from Paris to Vienna, and the comparison with the same distance in this country?

Mr. BLACK. I am sorry that I can not give the information to the gentleman, though it has always been my understanding that the telegraph and telephone service in the United States is much more prompt and expeditious.

Mr. SNYDER. I wanted to know if you had had any experience abroad in sending a message. I wish to say that it will take at least five times as long to get a message through there the same distance as it does here, and that is also true or the telephone. There is absolutely no practical comparison in any system between any country in which I have tried to send a message with this country here. We are always ahead of them in every direction.

Mr. BLACK. I take pride in the belief that the American business man is the leading business man in the world, that the American farmer is the best farmer in the world, that the American laborer is the most reliable and independent in the world, as I believe the American Republic is the best Government in the world. [Applause.]

Now, what I have said, gentlemen, is somewhat preliminary to the speech that I had intended to make.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILROAD, TELEGRAPH, AND TELEPHONE LINES.

Mr. Chairman, there is a recommendation in the Postmaster General's report which urges Government ownership of telegraph and telephone lines, and Chairman MOON, of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, introduced a bill yesterday in line with the Postmaster General's recommendation. This is not a new recommendation, but is one which has been made several times before by our present Postmaster General. It is only given new and added interest at this time by reason of the fact that the control of telegraph and telephone lines has been taken over by the Government under a belief of war necessity, and these lines are now being operated under such Government control.

In the limited time which I have at my disposal it would be impossible for me to venture upon a comprehensive discussion of the question of the Government ownership of railroads or the telegraph and telephone lines. I do want to say, however, that I have seen nothing in the Government operation of either the railroads or the telegraph and telephone lines which would cause me in the least to modify my opposition to the Government ownership of either. On the contrary, I am more firmly convinced than ever that the policy would be unwise and the most dangerous sort of a governmental venture.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman give in his admirable address there the date when the cables were taken over, and also the date when the telegraph and telephone lines were taken over?

Mr. BLACK. I will be glad to do that.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. SNYDER. In making my remark a moment ago, I had reference to the handling of the business by telegraph and telephone companies previous to the war.

Mr. BLACK. Yes. I think we all admit that the American telegraph and telephone service is more efficient and more expeditious than that of any European country. I think that is conceded by those who have had the actual opportunity to use both of them and compare their services. As I was stating when diverted by the questions, I believe this policy of Government ownership of railroads, telegraphs, and so forth, would be dangerous from a business and economical standpoint as well as to the genius of our political institutions. Unified operation of the railroads, it is true, under Government ownership will bring a saving in so far as that one particular feature of the matter is concerned, and perhaps it would do so as to telephone and telegraph lines. Theoretically, at least, the same public services can be performed in that way at less cost. There has never been any serious dispute about some economies being possible under unified control and management. Many of the most able railroad men of the country have fully realized the potency of that fact and have sought to put their ideas into execution, but they were restrained by the Sherman antitrust law and other legislative restrictions and were unable to effect this unification with its consequent economy and better service.

But under long-continued Government management, whatever is gained through unified operation in the first place will presently be lost because Government management in itself is unquestionably more expensive than private management. The roads will suffer that gradual hardening of the arteries which is inseparable from Government work; pay rolls will increase—they have increased enormously already as to railroads; initiative will decrease; red tape will grow under continued Government management; the gains incident to unified management and control will disappear. In fact, they have already made their exit, and the operating expenses of the railroads are now immeasurably greater than they were under private management, and have much more than wiped out any gains which have been made by reason of unified operation.

Therefore, I say that I have seen no magic in Government operation and control of railroads and telegraph and telephone companies which would cause me to reverse my lifetime views on that subject. And I do not favor the extension of the Government operation of them any longer than the present law provides. If the time of Government operation of the railroads, for example, is extended to a period of five years, as has been suggested by Director General McAdoo in his letter to Chairman SIMMS of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, then, judging the future by the past, at the end of that five years the railroads would be burdened with such an enormous increase in annual fixed charges that it would be utterly impossible to return to private ownership, because the public would never permit the railroad companies under private ownership to collect the high freight and passenger rates which it would be absolutely necessary to collect in order to meet these enormous additional fixed charges.

A five-year régime of Government control and operation will mean inevitable Government ownership, not because of any demonstration of greater economy or efficiency, but because of a burden of additional fixed charges and multiplied red tape and financial hardening of the arteries that will make return to private ownership impossible. Mr. G. H. Sines, chairman of the board of railroad wages and working conditions of the United States Railroad Administration, said in a recent speech before the labor reconstruction conference, Academy of Political Science, New York City, that, due to the general order of the Director General of Railroads issued May 25, this year, that the wages of railroad employees were first increased $300,000,000 per annum and that since then, in a period of less than six months, five subsequent general supplemental orders have been issued, which brings this increase up to $250,000,000 more annually, and that there are 650,000 employees who will be included in other orders which will be issued in the near future. He does not state how many millions of dollars more this order which is now pending will add to the $550,000,000 per annum which has already been fixed.

I want to pause just at this point and state briefly my views with reference to the enormous sums which have been paid out under orders of the Director General to railway employees as back pay. In settlement of wage advances which were made retroactive in their operation, I was astounded at some of the figures which I had read in the papers on this subject, and so, for purposes of verification, I requested the Director General to furnish me with accurate data as to this particular matter, and I will ask the clerk to read in my time a letter which I have received from Hon. Charles A. Prouty, director of the Division of Public Service and Accounting of the United States Railroad Administration, which gives the information, in part, which I sought:

DECEMBER 9, 1918.

Hon. EUGENE BLACK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yours of November 29, 1918, addressed to the Director General, has been referred to me.

The amount of back wages by class I railroads—that is, railroads with an annual income of $1,000,000 or more, most of whom are under Federal control—for the first five months of the calendar year was $230,731,277.

Some other amounts have been paid and will be paid by reason of the retroactive effect of wages, but I can not give you any accurate figures in addition to the above.

Very truly, yours, C. A. PROUTY, Director.

I do not question the action of the Director General for the wage increases which were given to the railway employees in so far as they would apply from the time the awards were made. These increases were undoubtedly liberal and generous, and there may be some question if they were not too much in some cases of the higher salaried employees; but be that as it may, I do question the justice to the American tax-paying public of the Director General's order making these wage increases retroactive in their effect and paying the enormous sum of $230,731,277 in the form of back pay. I think the people may well demand some explanation of that unprecedented action. [Applause.] Suppose when we passed the Post Office appropriation bill in the month of June, at the last session of Congress, in which we gave salary increases to postal employees which were to date from July 1, 1918, that we had proposed to make these increases retroactive and go back and pay such increases from January 1, 1918. What would have been the verdict of the public as to such procedure? And yet that kind of legislation on the part of Congress would have only cost the public a few million dollars, whereas Mr. McAdoo's retroactive wage increases cost $230,731,277 in the first five months of the year, which the American public will have to pay, because certainly no one will dispute that ultimately Jones pays the freight.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Two or three days ago I noticed in the Washington Evening Star—and I presume the gentleman noticed it—the statement that should the Government continue the control of railroads five years longer the pay of the railroad employees would not be diminished. I would like to know whether the gentleman has any explanation of the purpose, or knows the purpose, in making such a statement in the paper. It purports to come from the Director General's office. I can produce the paper.

Mr. BLACK. I will say to the gentleman that if I correctly interpreted the statement of Mr. G. H. Sines, chairman of the board of railroad wages and working conditions, the public need not expect any readjustment of these wage increases, notwithstanding there may be a substantial decline in the values of most everything else.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Could the gentleman explain the purpose of that statement?

Mr. BLACK. Of course, I would not attempt to interpret the statement of the purpose of another gentleman. I can only give his statement as it was made, and Members can have their own opinion as to the wisdom or unwisdom of it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They might be decreased or they might be increased.

Mr. BLACK. I presume that the gentleman means that in the period that is immediately ahead of us, that there might arise good reasons for further increases or, on the contrary, a decline in values and falling off of business might make some decreases imperative. I agree with you.

Mr. SLOAN. To meet that large expenditure for back wages, and so on, was that met by increased freight collections, or was it also met in part by money which this Government loaned through its War Finance Corporation to the railroads?

Mr. BLACK. I presume it was met by the freight increases that were added since the Government took control. I can imagine that the feeling of some of the employees when they got their checks for back pay, some of them amounting to considerable sums, was somewhat akin to the feeling of one Ezekiel Corntassel, a North Carolina mountaineer, who celebrated an Easter Monday by going for the first time in his life to a horse race. It was a new experience to him, and his companions easily persuaded him to stake in the third race a dollar on a sixty-to-one shot. Contrary to all expectation on the part of the bookmakers, Zeke's horse won, and when the bookmaker handed over to him $61, he said, "Do you mean to tell me that I get all this money for one dollar?" "That's what you do," said the bookmaker. Zeke's eyes looked like Sinbad's in the valley of diamonds, and he muttered to himself, "By gosh, I wonder how long this thing has been goin' on, and just to think I never knowed it before."

No doubt many of the railroad employees when they received their checks for their part of this $230,731,277 back pay, wondered why the idea of Government operation and control had not been thought of long ago. Men usually do not forget their own interests. Human nature is very much the same the world over among all of us, and in view of this very generous and liberal treatment which the employees have received under Government operation and control, it is perfectly natural that they should advocate Government ownership.

The general public, however, who have been called upon to pay 25 per cent increase in freight rates and 50 per cent increase in passenger rates will probably not be so enthusiastic over the proposition, and will no doubt be somewhat more critical in their attitude and will ask to be "shown."

Now, I will not attempt to go exhaustively into the reasons why I do not advocate this Government-ownership idea—why I favor the principles of individual initiative under proper Government supervision and regulation rather than an experiment in State socialism—but this one other thing I want to say, and that is: Government ownership of great business enterprises like the railroad and telegraph and telephone companies would have an unfair advantage over the private business of the country in this way: When periods of reduced business activity come and things are dull, private business must adjust itself to the changed conditions, effect business economies, reduce overhead expenses, and thus meet the exigencies of the situation and cope with it until the time of depression is passed. It must do these things or else go into bankruptcy.

But not so with the Government. When times are dull and business reduced, it does not, as a usual thing, reduce expenses and effect economies. It meets the situation by making taxation rates higher, which, in the event we had Government ownership of railroads, would be reflected either in higher freight and passenger rates or else the deficit would be made up by general taxation.

Do you suppose that 2,000,000 men on the Government pay roll under Government ownership of railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines, closely organized and operating under our system of political control, would ever consent to any reduction in wages, regardless of how imperative the need might be? There is, however, one class which is never organized, except spasmodically and temporarily, to influence government in its behalf. This is the taxpayers. It is the largest class of all; but a small body of voters, having a single common interest which it has organized itself to promote, often exert more influence on government than a large class whose members do not clearly recognize their common interest and organize especially to promote it. Therefore the class which under Government ownership is least likely to be protected is the taxpayers. In the legislative consideration of this great question we certainly should not leave them out of the equation.

It is not for the railroad, telegraph, or telephone companies that I speak, because under Government ownership they would not suffer. The Constitution guarantees them against taking their property for public use without just compensation, and everybody will admit that the Government generally pays enough for what it gets. No; it is not for them that I speak. Those that I want to speak for, when this great question comes up for settlement, is the body of unorganized taxpayers, the general public, who, while they rarely ask for any special consideration, have a right to expect their Representatives in Congress to see to it that their interests are not overlooked and that they receive a square deal. [Applause.]

I confidently believe the American Congress will be equal to the task, that the rights of the public will be protected, and that Government ownership will not be fastened upon the country under the guise of war necessity.

Now, I recognize that before the railroads are turned back to their owners that it will probably be wise to enact some additional legislation for their regulation and control. Personally I think that Federal incorporation of all interstate railroads will probably be found to be a wise policy to adopt, with provisions that the capital stock of any such incorporation shall not exceed the actual cash paid in or value of the property after deducting the amount of its bonded indebtedness. I advocate the broadening and extension of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, so that the securities issued by interstate railroads thus incorporated under Federal charter would be under strict Government supervision and control. This idea would carry into effect a bill introduced in the Sixty-third Congress by my colleague, Mr. RAYBURN, of Texas; also that proper pooling agreements between different systems be allowed, subject to approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think that it would also probably be wise to create a commission, with power to decide questions of wages, hours of labor, and conditions of employment as they may arise between the railroad companies and their employees, and that the membership of this commission should be composed of an equal number of those representing owners and stockholders of the railroads, the employees, and the general public.

These brief suggestions I make at this time as matters worthy of consideration from the standpoint of legislative treatment of the subject, so far as the railroads are concerned. I do not know that any immediate legislation is necessary at all so far as the telegraph and telephone companies are concerned before they are turned back to their owners. To say the least of it, that is a subject which Congress can take up in the regular and orderly way, and I know of nothing which would seem to demand any precipitate haste.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 31 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say with reference to the question of Government ownership of railroads and telegraph and telephone lines.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. My memory does not retain the statement of the length of time for which the back pay was given.

Mr. BLACK. The $230,731,277 was for the first five months of the year.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wanted to make that inquiry in order to be sure.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In that connection, if the gentleman will pardon me, was there not some understanding that there was a controversy as to the amount these railroad employees should be paid, and was not that submitted to some board of arbitration or conciliation to determine the just amount, and was there not an agreement at that time that the award should go back to the time when the question arose?

Mr. BLACK. There was no board of arbitration or conciliation, but when Director General McAdoo took charge he appointed a railroad wage commission, composed, I believe, of Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Charles C. McChord, J. Harry Covington, and William R. Willcox, and after receiving their report Mr. McAdoo issued his General Order No. 27, putting the salary increases into effect. The point that I desire to stress is that in governmental enterprises salary increases should be dated from the date that the award is made, unless there is an unusual reason for it to be otherwise. Take the instance I gave as to the increase of salaries to postal employees. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, of course, spent a considerable time in investigating the merits of their claims, and we determined that they were entitled to some increases, and we passed a bill giving them such increases, not so generous perhaps as were awarded to the railroad employees, and yet we did not undertake to make them retroactive. We dated it from July 1, 1918. I think that the claim of postal employees for retroactive wage increases would have rested on as good ground as that of railroad employees.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the gentleman would easily understand that there would be more justification under the circumstances of an agreement than if it were merely an arbitrary action?

Mr. BLACK. Yes. If indeed there was any such agreement of that kind, although I do not defend the agreement, if there was, because I do not think it was a just matter to the American public to give this $230,731,277 of back pay, unless there was a much better reason for it than any which I have thus far seen advanced.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL FOR 1920.

Mr. Chairman, the Post Office appropriation bill which we now have under consideration is for the fiscal year of 1920, which begins July 1, 1919, and ends June 30, 1920. The bill which we passed at the recent session of Congress was for the fiscal year 1919, and the latest report of the Postmaster General, which was released only a few days ago and which is now available for reference and study, is for the fiscal year 1918, which ended June 30, 1918. That report will furnish profitable information to any Member who will take the time to read it.

To my way of thinking there are some very good reasons why the receipts and disbursements of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1918, as disclosed by the report of the Postmaster General, should be carefully studied in comparison with the probable receipts for the fiscal year 1920, and the appropriations for expenditures carried in this bill for such fiscal year of 1920.

A recital of facts and figures of this kind is, of course, dry and uninteresting from some points of view, and yet information of such nature is necessary in determining the wisdom or unwisdom of certain legislative provisions carried in this bill and certain legislative proposals now pending in the Senate in what is known as the war revenue bill. I think I will be able to conclusively demonstrate that if the permanent salary increases to postal employees which are carried in section 2 of the bill which we now have under consideration are adopted and the increases in postage on first and second class mail matter which were provided in the war revenue bill of 1917 are repealed, then such action will inevitably and to a mathematical certainty create a large deficit annually in the Post Office Department. If this fact be true, and I think I will be able to establish that it is, then the question squarely presents itself: Do we want the Post Office Department operated upon a self-sustaining basis, or do we want it conducted at a heavy annual loss?

I am not one of those who believe that the Post Office Department should be operated as a source of profit to the Federal Government or as a money-making institution, but I do believe that it should be made to pay its own way, and that it is the duty of Congress to lend every encouragement to the Postmaster General to enable him to accomplish that result. I would not any more advocate that the Postal Service be operated at a loss than I would advocate that the railroad companies, the express companies, the telegraph and telephone companies be operated at a loss.

I hold that it is fundamental that any unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation, and that if the railroad companies or the express companies or the telegraph or the telephone companies were operated at rates and charges while under Government control which would cause a large deficit to pile up that any tax on the general public to make up such a deficit would be an unjust tax, because it would be in its very nature an unnecessary tax—unnecessary because the rates should be made adequate to meet the fixed charges.

Director General McAdoo has recognized and has taken into consideration the soundness of this view and early in the period of Government control issued a general order increasing freight rates approximately 25 per cent and passenger rates approximately 50 per cent. These increased freight and passenger rates were made necessary by increased operating expenses, which I have already discussed.

I am not passing upon the correctness of all these increased operating expenses, but what I do affirm with entire confidence is this: When these increased operating expenses were added the way to provide to meet them was by increased freight and passenger rates rather than general taxation. For in that way Jones pays the freight, rather than Jones and Smith by taxation, when maybe Smith does not have any freight to haul and stays at home and does not ride the passenger trains or the Pullman cars.

Another advantage of that method is this: When you increase these operating costs, such as increases in wages and other overhead charges, and thereby increase the rates which the public has to pay, that same public will sooner or later begin to inquire as to the reasonableness and justness of such increases and will ask to be shown why they were made. This fact will serve as a check on wasteful and extravagant expenditures, whereas, if such increases while under Government control should be allowed to pile up as a deficit and be met by general taxation, levied to meet thousands of other expenditures of the various and sundry departments of the Government, this wholesome check will not be had, and the usual invitation to extravagant and wasteful expenditures will obtain.

Therefore, I am emphatically in favor of the Post Office Department being operated upon a self-sustaining basis, both now and hereafter, and I think that the present Postmaster General deserves the thanks and commendation of the American people for having operated the Post Office Department upon something more than a self-sustaining basis during each and every year since he has been in office except one, that being the fiscal year 1915, when the European war broke out and which fiscal year began July 1, 1914.

The audited postal surplus of the Post Office Department since Postmaster General Burleson has been in office, for the several different years, is as follows:

1918	19,626,774.08
	39,668,685.10
1915 (deficit)	11,333,308.97
Total net surplus to June 30, 1918	28,335,376.13

Without any desire to be partisan or to criticize the policy and administration of any other Postmaster General who has served our Nation in the past, I challenge the showing of a better record than this of Mr. Burleson in the history of the Postal Service. Of course I very well understand that he has been the target of some criticism, some of it bitter, and much of it, as I think, unjust and without cause, but despite all criticism and fault-finding the fact remains that he and his able assistants and the thousands of loyal and efficient postmasters and postal employees who have served under him have moved steadily forward and are to-day operating the Postal Service more efficiently than at any time in the history of the Government, especially when the difficulties and unusual conditions of the war period are taken into consideration.

I said awhile ago that if the salary increases provided in section 2 of this bill are adopted, and the increased postage on first and second class mail heretofore provided in the war-revenue bill is repealed, then an analysis of the estimated receipts of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1920, taken in connection with the appropriations carried in this bill, will be bound to point out to us a large deficit in the postal revenues for the fiscal year 1920. And I think that is a subject well worthy of our thought and consideration.

Having made that statement, I will now undertake to demonstrate it: The total postal receipts for the fiscal year 1918, which ended June 30 last, were $388,975,962.24, and of this amount $44,500,000 was increased postage collected under the terms of the war-revenue bill from November 2, 1917, to June 30, 1918, and has been paid into the Treasury of the United States by the Postmaster General in the manner prescribed by the act of Congress which directed its collection.

This leaves $344,475,962.24 as general postal revenues collected under the normal postal rates for the fiscal year 1918, and, as I have stated, shows a surplus of $19,626,774.08, after deducting all expenditures, but it must be remembered that the recent salary increases of postal employees did not go into effect until July 1, 1918, and therefore are not reflected in the figures for the fiscal year 1918.

That these increases will have a considerable reflection in the fiscal years 1919 and 1920 there need be no doubt, and it is that feature of the matter that I now want to discuss in some detail.

The total receipts of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1918, figures of which I have already given, exclusive of the war-revenue portion, was an increase of 4.47 per cent over the receipts of 1917, and if this same percentage of increase continues for the fiscal years 1919 and 1920, then the receipts will be approximately $375,000,000 for the fiscal year 1920.

Under no stretch of reasonable imagination or intelligent forecast, based on the law of general averages which has governed in the past, can we reasonably expect that the postal revenues for the fiscal year 1920, assuming that the 3-cent letter postage and zone rates on second-class matter are repealed, will be greater than $375,000,000.

I want to call special attention to that, gentlemen, because in the consideration of this bill we must face the facts as they are. I repeat that under no stretch of reasonable imagination or intelligent forecast, based on the law of general averages which has governed in the past, can we reasonably expect that the postal revenues for the fiscal year 1920, assuming that the 3-cent letter postage and zone rates on second-class matter are repealed, there will be greater than $375,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Let me finish the statement, and then I will yield.

Now, the appropriations carried in the bill which we now have under consideration total $359,657,577, and if we adopt section 2 of the bill, which provides these permanent salary increases to postal employees, then at least $40,000,000 more will have to be added to the total of the bill, either here or in the Senate, which will swell the total of the appropriations carried in it to more than $400,000,000.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. MOON. The estimate of the Post Office Department for the increase of salaries under section 2 and the carriers under section 1 totals $34,000,000.

Mr. BLACK. I called up Mr. Koons, if the gentleman will permit, the First Assistant Postmaster General, and he states that his first estimate was based on the idea of the suspension of automatic promotions. But inasmuch as the bill provides for the automatic promotions, it will take more than $40,000,000.

Mr. MOON. I think you can take that letter for it.

Mr. BLACK. I submit to the gentleman from Tennessee that the figure of $40,000,000 additional amount to be added to the appropriations already carried in the bill is correct, and that he will find it so.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Can the gentleman state what the loss will be by reason of the repeal of the zone rates?

Mr. BLACK. Those rates are of ascending costs. It is so framed that in the fourth year it would reach its peak of revenue, and would yield at that time between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000, I believe, depending, of course, upon the amount of second-class mail matter then carried in the mails.

I hope that gentlemen will not think that I am indulging in speculative matters of imagination or fine-spun fancies of theory. I am giving you statements of fact, which you can verify yourselves, if you will take the trouble to do so. First Assistant Postmaster General Koons has stated to me authoritatively that the adoption of section 2 of the bill will add something more than $40,000,000 to the expenses of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1920.

I suppose no one who is posted on the effect of the section, and has figured it out for himself, will dispute the accuracy of Mr. Koons's statement. Therefore, assuming that the average increases in postal receipts which have obtained during the war period continue for the fiscal year 1920, then the total receipts for that year will be, as I have stated, $375,000,000, or $25,000,000 less than the expenditures which we are now proposing to authorize and direct in this bill.

WAR INFLATION CAN NOT BE KEPT UP—WAR CONDITIONS WILL PASS.

But can we expect the average increase in postal receipts to continue after the war? I think not. We all very well understand that the country has been passing through a period of war inflation and unexampled prosperity in many lines, and this prosperity has been reflected in the postal receipts for the last four years, and while I do not want to be understood as making any gloomy predictions for the future, still I think it would be very unwise for us to base our calculations on the assumption that this war inflation will continue now that the war has ended. If it should continue, then one thing is very certain; it will inevitably wreck the finances of the country and bring industrial anarchy and chaos to our people. No nation, it matters not how rich it may be, can go on continually piling up a huge bonded indebtedness and an unending inflation of its paper currency. There must inevitably come a day of liquidation and no amount of foolish argument or specious pleas can avoid it. Those of Bolsheviki tendencies can pass all the resolutions they please, and make fervid and lurid speeches, but no amount of such trash and bombast can ever bring prosperity to any country or solve its problems of reconstruction and readjustment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Can the gentleman yield me 10 minutes more?

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. I read in a paper not long ago where one of these fervid Bolsheviki orators was making a speech and said: "Work after the war. Nonsense; there ought to be no work after war. Do they call that making the world safe for democracy?" It takes the great wheels of industry in the mine and factory, on the farm, and in the marts of trade, going round and round, to bring happiness and peace and prosperity to the people, and these wheels of industry must be adjusted to conditions as they are and not what a lot of dreamers and theorists would interpret them to be.

So, gentlemen, the country had just as well prepare itself for an era of some decline in prices, not too radical, I hope, and gradual in its processes, but which is bound to come, and which will be reflected in the selling prices of manufactured articles, farm products, transportation, and wages of labor. The more uniform and just in proportion this decline can be effected the less will be the disturbance to the social and industrial fabric of the Nation.

The real task of statesmanship, of those in public authority, of those in positions of business and financial responsibility, of those high in the councils of labor, is to see that the decline does fall in just and uniform proportion, and that no one interest, or class, or group is protected against this inevitable decline and shrinkage of values at the expense of the other.

Already certain interests and groups are issuing defies that they will not stand for any readjustment; that they will resist to the bitter end any curtailment of their particular interests. "Reduce the compensation of others," they say. "Let the farmer's product decline; let everything else meet the test of changing conditions; but, as for us, keep your hands off. We are going to hold what we have got."

Suppose that all business and agricultural and industrial enterprises assume the attitude that they will stand for no readjustment in prices under changed conditions. Suppose the manufacturer says that he must get the same price for his product which he has been receiving during the period of war inflation, and that if he does not, then he will close up his factory and quit. Suppose the farmer insists that he must continue to sell his corn and his cotton and his wheat and his hogs and his cattle at prices which have prevailed during the war, when millions of men have been under arms and out of the avenues of production, or else he will cease to produce and will allow the grass, the bramble, and the thorn to grow where once waved the broad acres of corn and wheat and blossomed the snowy fields of cotton. Suppose the laborer in the mine and factory and at the forge and furnace refuses to go on with his work unless some of the unusual rates of pay which have prevailed during the war are continued. What will be the result? The answer is very simple. Industrial anarchy and chaos will be inevitable. Bolshevism, if you please, will stalk abroad to point its bony fingers at a once happy and prosperous people.

But I do not take the pessimistic view that such a condition will prevail. Our people understand too well the value of cooperation with one another for a condition like that to be allowed to obtain to any very large extent. The radicals, whether in the business world or in industry or agriculture or labor or wherever they may be, will not be permitted to prevail in their radical, destructive ideas; but, on the contrary, the American spirit of justice and fair play will dominate. It is bound to dominate. It has dominated this Government for 140 years and has made our great Republic what it is to-day, and I am not afraid that we will desert our cherished principles and traditions. One very eminent American public man said in a speech not very long ago that the test of the civilization of any people is their ability to cooperate, and I think that statement is undoubtedly true, and I hope that the spirit of the American people will be able to meet this test in dealing with the complex problems which are immediately ahead of us in the months that are to come. I have confidence to believe that they will adequately meet the test, not without some blunders and mistakes—no; because human intelligence and human motives are not free from error. But all in all, by and large, we will come through these difficulties safe and sane, as we have often emerged before. [Applause.]

In the period that is ahead of us capital must realize that it must be content with smaller dividends and be willing to make a liberal and just division with labor. Labor, on its part, must realize that the great factories, engines, forges, and furnaces are useless and but a pile of steel, mortar, and stone without capital and the power of a directing genius to operate them. All sides must realize that the spirit of justice and fair play is far more fruitful in its ultimate results than a spirit of prejudice and hate.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL AGAIN.

But I will return from this digression. What I was talking about at the time of the digression was the prospective deficit of at least $25,000,000 in the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1920. And now, having given the figures as to that matter, I will naturally be asked the question as to what will be my attitude as to how to meet the deficit. I do want to emphasize my emphatic advocacy of the policy that the Post Office Department should be self-sustaining in its operations, and be allowed to protect against the creation of a deficit, and that is the purpose of this part of my remarks. I have pointed out this impending deficit with the view that we should have these facts in mind when the proposition is made to repeal the zone postal law and the 3-cent letter postage. We must retain one or the other of these and maybe both. I further call your attention to the fact that these permanent salary increases which we are about to pass are of ascending costs on account of the automatic promotion law, and in 1921 will cost at least $50,000,000 more than present law and in 1922 at least $55,000,000 more than at present. In 1922 the increases will reach their peak of cost.

So it looks to me like the zone postal rates on second-class matter have come to stay, unless we are to adopt the policy of operating the Post Office Department at a large annual deficit and making up this deficit by general taxation. Surely we will not resort to so unwise a policy as that, and I certainly want to register my protest against any such idea as that. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD a statement from Gen. Koons, First Assistant Postmaster General, showing additional expenditures on account of salaries for 1919 over 1918.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Minnesota will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, upon another occasion I had something to say about the wretched Postal Service, particularly between the people in this country and the boys at the front. But I want to take advantage of this general debate this afternoon to say just a word in regard to the inefficient service being rendered by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. The subject has been dealt with by a number of other Members, but I desire to present some further facts that may be of interest to the membership of the House.

In common with every Member of this House, I have been deluged with complaints from parents and wives at home stating that they have not got their allotments and allowances. While at the beginning, when the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was being organized, there were excusable delays, many of us had hoped that at the end of a year or more these annoying delays and instances of neglect would be remedied. Congress quickly responded to every request for appropriations of money amply sufficient to make this service efficient in every respect. But still complaints came in in increasing numbers. Just before the election, when I went home at the time of the recess of Congress, I had not been home 24 hours when I was called upon by two different women, who said they had not received a single cent of their allotments for nine months, and I have since had a great many similar cases. In most cases there does not seem to be any excuse whatever for the delay and neglect.

One of the most outrageous cases that came to my attention was that of a sailor boy who had been 18 months upon a vessel in the North Sea and was given 30 days' leave of absence in this country independent of and in addition to the time taken in coming and going. He had made an allotment to his wife 12 months before, and for 12 months the money had been taken out of his pay. When he reached Cambridge and went to see his family he found that they had not received one single cent and were obliged to depend for their support on the generosity of friends and neighbors. There are hundreds and thousands—yes, tens of thousands—of cases where these boys have gone over to fight the battles of their country thinking that the folks at home are being taken care of by a generous Government. And they are not being taken care of. And what are the soldier boys going to do when they come home and find that their families have been thus neglected? In my opinion they are going to hold the officials responsible for this inexcusable inefficiency to a strict account for what their dear ones have needlessly suffered.

Worse than that, after we Members of Congress take these cases up, and after months of delay the thing is straightened out and the families begin to receive the money, after a month or two it frequently happens that the same thing happens again.

Now, there is one other matter, Mr. Chairman, which I wish to call to the attention of the committee in connection with this matter. With the money that we have appropriated for the use of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for the carrying out of this necessary work there have been put upon the pay roll hundreds of men as inspectors and field investigators, and they have been making secret reports to Washington, and on the basis of those reports allowances are being taken away from dependent families. While I have no objection to the legitimate work of these investigators in unearthing fraud, I have three cases that I want particularly to bring to your attention to show what is actually being done under the guise of protecting the Government.

There are two women in the city of Cambridge, one of whom has five boys in the service and one of whom has four. In time of peace, before this war commenced, each one of the boys in both these families brought all his wages home to his mother, and they were able to get along comfortably. In each of these cases the mother has been notified that all the Government allowances have been taken away, and that she must refund to the Government a sum of money equal to all allowances received by her. Why? These women are sisters, and it seems that they each own the equity in the house occupied by the family. I presume that these inspectors found from the records of the assessors of the city of Cambridge that there was a house assessed to each of these women. As a matter of fact the houses are heavily mortgaged, and yet on the strength of the assessment, on the ground that these mothers were not absolutely dependent upon the wages of these boys, the allowance has been taken away in both cases.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not understand what difference that can make under the law—the fact that the woman has a house. Can the gentleman explain?

Mr. DALLINGER. I simply know that the reason given by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is that the mothers were not entirely dependent upon the boys and therefore not entitled to the allowance.

Mr. REYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. No; I have not the time.

Mr. REYBURN. The inspector has to do whatever the law requires in the case.

Mr. DALLINGER. Now, here is another case: An old man, unable to work, sick a good deal of the time, has a daughter who is also an invalid, who keeps house for him. He has three boys in the service, who before the war paid their wages to the father each week. The fourth boy, his only remaining dependence, was drafted just before the war ceased. One of the boys married just before he went into the Army, and the second one married after he got to France. That left one boy in the service who made an allotment to the father. Now, they found that the old gentleman had a house and land, which was assessed for the large sum of $1,200. On the strength of that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance took away his allowance. I say, Mr. Chairman, that such an interpretation of the law on the part of the War Risk Insurance Bureau was never contemplated by Congress. Of course, where a family had plenty of money and were not in any way dependent upon the wages of the soldier it is all right and appropriate that the Government should not add an allowance to the allotment; but where in cases of this kind, with a heavily mortgaged home or real property bringing in no income and where the boys in time of peace contributed all their wages to the support of the aged parents, I say it is outrageous to take away the allowance that Congress provided.

In my opinion there is no excuse whatever in most of these cases for the delays in the allotment and allowances. I find, however, that the same delay exists in regard to soldiers' pay. I found boys last spring in the Walter Reed Hospital that had not received any pay for months. The other day it came to the attention of the Committee on Education, in hearings on the rehabilitation act, that in all the big cities boys in uniform were begging on the streets because they had received no pay. I have case after case in my district where not only the boy has had no pay since he has been in the Army, but the family has received no allotment or allowance. Thousands of these families have to be supported by charity because of the inexcusable inefficiency and incompetency of this kind of administration of the executive branch of the Government, which is a disgrace to the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE].

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, like my colleague who has just taken his seat, I have had some unpleasant experiences with the War Risk and Allotments Bureaus of the War Department. I could repeat many cases similar to those just stated to the House. There seems to be no reason why these conditions should exist. I can readily see how a delay of a month, or perhaps for two months, might happen; but when the delays runs on for 12 months, 14 months, 15 months, and these boys are without their salaries, families without allotments, with all the men in uniform around these streets, there must be something wrong to cause such a condition.

But that, too, applies, Mr. Chairman, to the department for which we are now considering appropriations. In all my experience I have never had so many people come to me with complaints of the condition of the mail service. I can readily see, too, that there may be a reason that the deplorable condition of the service is, in some measure, because of the lack of help. I can readily see that this department may have been affected as much, if not more, than any other department of the Government, but certainly the Government has been liberal in appropriating money in order that it may do this work, and I am proud to say this year it has seen fit to give some of this money to those who are trying their utmost to build up the Postal Service of this country. It is going into the homes of the men and the women who are working in the various branches of the department. It is going to help them to receive a substantial remuneration for the service rendered, and I trust that after that money has been appropriated others will be appropriated that will not only benefit them in a financial way, but will improve their working conditions; give them a workshop fit to work in, in a building owned by the Government, and not one that would not be permitted in any city or town or by any private corporation. That condition does prevail in this country in the Post Office Department. The sanitary conditions that these men are obliged to work under are deplorable and should be discontinued at once.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would not have taken my place to-day but for the fact that I have read in the report of the Postmaster General something that to me and others is a remarkable inconsistency. With other Members on the floor for the past four years, I have advocated the retention of a branch of the service that we believed, and I still believe, was of advantage to the people of this country. I refer to the pneumatic-tube service, which has the indorsement of all the commercial organizations of the country and the opposition of but one man—Burleson. Congress passed an act maintaining this service year after year, but the item failed to stay in the appropriation bill last session. We who advocated it were held up to ridicule and scorn because we were advocating something which we knew was benefiting the great commercial business of this country, but which, for reasons not yet properly explained, could not secure a fair word from the Postmaster General. The Postmaster General in his report to-day shows his inconsistency, shows how he has been inconsistent, for, after stating the reasons for the abolition of the pneumatic-mail service, in the very next column he advocates the building beneath the congested district of the city of New York a tunnel or tube for carrying the mails. The appropriation for pneumatic-mail service was less than $1,000,000 each year, yet here in this report, for the building of a tunnel, as he says, from the Pennsylvania Station to the New York Central Station, a distance of a mile, he wants an appropriation of $1,500,000. When I read that report, Mr. Chairman, I asked men engaged in the contracting business, who have built subways and have built different underground systems of that city, if the figures were anywhere near what they should be. They ridiculed the figures. I want to call to the attention of the committee what the conditions as I know them are in that section of the city of New York. To build a tunnel from the Pennsylvania Station to the New York Central Station they will be obliged to go down 100 feet under the ground to get under the tunnels now in existence. Under Times Square there are three separate tunnels, one under the other, and the lower tunnel is more than 100 feet under the ground. Almost every inch of that ground from the Pennsylvania Station to the New York Central Station on Forty-second Street is through solid rock.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. TAGUE was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that it is necessary to reply to the remarks of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE], because the amount of money already realized from the abolition of the pneumatic-tube system is very great. In reference to the tunnel in New York which is proposed, it will be remembered by the House that under the law the leases for the tube should not be continued except upon the recommendation of the postal committee appointed under the act of Congress, which provided for inspection and recommendation as to continuance or rejection. The committee reported against all of the tubes except a portion of the city of New York that was so much congested, and they thought some system of that sort ought to remain there. The Congress, however, abolished the whole system. In pursuance of the law, in pursuance of justice to the city of New York and the congested conditions that exist in that particular part of the city, there has been a recommendation made for the construction, not of these inadequate tubes but of a tunnel that would be sufficient to carry all of the mail and be a source of profit itself to the Government. But that issue is all past, and it is not necessary for me to discuss it. There is nothing of that kind in the bill.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN].

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I most heartily concur with the remarks of the gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER and Mr. TAGUE] pertaining to the subjects of the soldiers' allotments and the Post Office Pneumatic Tube Service.

In my opinion the delay in the payment of the allotments is inexcusable, and my experience is the same as that of which the gentlemen complain. I am aware that the great volume of business which is constantly handled by the War Risk Insurance Bureau is one of great magnitude and complexity, but since the signing of the armistice I see no reason why a speeding up of investigation and report, as well as payments long overdue, should not be made. A newly inaugurated policy of the bureau of demanding from widowed mothers and other dependent and indigent members of the soldiers' families who have received allotments inconsistent with some technical rule of the bureau is a most inequitable, unjust, and inhuman proceeding.

Recently I have had the distressing experience of interviews with widowed mothers, one of whom had three sons in the service, from whom had been demanded the return of allotment payment. There can be no question of the embarrassment of such an existing condition, and Congress should by all means remedy this unfortunate situation.

I can not forego this opportunity when the Post Office appropriation bill is under consideration to fail to join with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] in the indorsing of the proposal of the Postmaster General for a subservice system in the metropolitan city of New York, part of which I have the honor to represent. The Postmaster General advocates the construction of an underground tunnel from the Pennsylvania Station to the Grand Central Station. It is proposed that it be used for the distributing of the mails from the Southern and Western States to the Eastern and Northern ones. The proposed tunnel will in no way serve the city of New York in the distribution of its own mail. I am informed that the appropriation of a million and a half has been suggested for its construction. In my opinion it is uneconomic and impracticable.

Uneconomic for the reason that there are now 26 miles of pneumatic tubes connecting the Pennsylvania, Grand Central, and the Harlem district, which I represent, and its eastern and western stations with the City Hall station, which can be leased as formerly by the Government for a very reasonable price for the service performed. Since July last, when this service was abolished and the vehicular service was installed, the delivery delay has been increased to a remarkable degree. Under the tube system there was dispatched about every 10 minutes carriers which required about 18 minutes in passage for the mail to be carried from Harlem to the down-town stations. By the present auto delivery a period of two and a half hours is consumed in traveling the same area, and the time more frequently consumed is about three and a quarter hours.

It will readily be seen that the present delay in the delivery of the mails is regrettable and annoying. Telegrams from the New York Chamber of Commerce and the Merchants' Association of New York, calling attention to the abolishing of the pneumatic-tube service and expressing the hope that it will be reinstated is a substantial and intelligent expression of the desire of the business interests of the city of New York for the reoperating of the system. However, as the learned chairman of the committee [Mr. MOON] says, the present operation of the pneumatic-tube service is a closed question.

In conclusion I wish to state that I entertain no prejudice against the Postmaster General. My mind is open and not foreclosed as to his qualifications or his intentions. We must, in all fairness at least, say: That he now admits the existence of the serious traffic street congestion and the necessity for resorting to an underground mail transportation service. Such service, however, can not, in the opinion of experts, be constructed in the city of New York for the sum of a million and a half dollars by reason of the present subway railroad system. It would necessitate the sinking of the proposed tunnel to approximately 100 feet, almost an impossible engineering problem, and would be necessary to tunnel through bedrock.

I therefore submit for the consideration of the House the necessity of the underground service, which the Postmaster General now declares is essential. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have come this afternoon, in the midst of general debate on this great appropriation bill, to take a few minutes of your time to pay a tribute to the valor of some of Oklahoma's soldiers on the western front. [Applause.] I want to say to this House that I hope that the time will never come when it will be too busy and when the business of this House is too important to spare a few moments to pay some tribute to the heroes who have fought that we might still be here and have the right to speak. [Applause.] This war has demonstrated one thing beyond peradventure, and that is that the geographic location of the men has nothing to do with their fighting qualities. This war has demonstrated that the men from the East, the West, the North, and South have displayed great courage on the battle field side by side, and I shall take a few minutes of your time to talk about the soldiers from Oklahoma. They fought side by side with the soldiers from every State in the Union. I call your attention to the splendid record of the Thirty-sixth and Ninetieth Divisions, and I present some information that has come from across the sea. The Thirty-sixth Division, known as the Panther Division, was in action for 16 days. The record shows that the division met the crack division, known as the Kaiser's Favorites; we are told that in the first three hours of action their casualties amounted to 2,000 men. They went out upon the open, expecting the enemy to meet them in hand-to-hand fighting, but they were disappointed, because the enemy withdrew their men from the battle field east of Rheims and they had to face the machine-gun fire which caused so many casualties and losses. The Ninetieth Division, consisting of many soldiers from Oklahoma, fought for 74 days on the western front, and we are told that at 9.40 o'clock on the 11th day of November the Ninetieth was in action and under fire, and the One hundred and eightieth Brigade of that division, led by Lieut. Col. Teall, son-in-law of our distinguished and able Representative from New York [Mr. SNYDER], at that time was under fire and in the lead. [Applause.] Gentlemen, we can never say too much of the bravery of those men. They have absolutely won for themselves great glory and renown on the battle field. I say to you that they have crowned their fathers and mothers with great glory that they brought such men into the world. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the Clerk to read in my time the order of commendation that was written by Maj. Gen. Allen, commending the Ninetieth Division, a true copy of which was sent by Col. Teall.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS NINETIETH DIVISION,
AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
France, November 14, 1918.

General Orders, No. 144.

1. Prior to beginning operations in this, the Meuse-Argonne, sector the commanding general published to the division on October 15, 1918, his estimate of it, reserving final decision as to where it should be classed until later. He no longer has any doubts or reluctance in claiming for the Ninetieth Division fighting qualities second to none. Every regiment has gained its objective in every operation in which it has participated, and the division has exceeded its allotment in the execution of every task assigned it.

2. Beginning October 31, the work of the division, including the taking of the strong position Freya Stelling, from Andevanne through Villers-devant-Dun to the Meuse River, against the determined resistance of two enemy shock divisions, Twenty-eighth and Twenty-seventh, has been simply superb. The crossing of the Meuse and the taking of the line Stenay-Baalon, including both towns, has been a continuation of the previous successful work of this division.

3. This division received two official commendations for its work in the St. Mihiel salient near the Moselle River, and to-day it has received the third of a series of three commendations, in which the Third Corps commander expresses his high appreciation of the gallant conduct, which he desires to make of permanent record. I make no mention of the general commendations given by the commander of the First Army and the commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces, in which this division was included.

4. The division commander has no adequate words to express his great satisfaction and delight with the fine military spirit of the division and his pride in its fighting value after 74 days (less an interval of 7 days) in the fighting lines. The Engineer, the sanitary troops, the Signal Battalion, and the trains have emulated the fighting impulses of the combatant troops. In spite of the severe losses and the terrific demands that these successes have exacted, the indomitable spirit and keenness to fight continue to characterize the division.

5. Every member of this gallant force has a right to be proud of the services he has rendered in the great cause of human liberty. Our country may count with assurance upon the execution with success of whatever duty it may intrust to the Ninetieth Division.

HENRY T. ALLEN, Major General.

A true copy.

E. H. HEALL, Lieutenant Colonel,
Adjutant, One hundred and eightieth Infantry Brigade.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, when the casualty lists have all come in I know no more fitting tribute that this House could pay to the memory of those who gave up their all than to hold a memorial service out of respect to the soldiers of this country who died in France. Before I conclude I want to pay a word of tribute to the Indian soldiers of my country. The report shows that the One hundred and forty-second lost heavily in the fight. It was the hardest hit. "The Indians of the One hundred and forty-second started in easy, without much show of enthusiasm, but when they saw the blood they got excited and turned into savages again and turned on the Huns with such havoc that there was no withstanding them." This record, gentlemen, was made by many men who gave their lives for their country, and I hope the time will come when this House will hold a memorial service in their memory. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he desires to proceed further?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have reserved half an hour for the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] to discuss the aeroplane service, but he had to go back to New York, and he requested that I should try to get him in on Monday. So, if the chairman of the committee could see in the kindness of his heart the way clear to move to rise now, I would promise that I would yield to Mr. LAGUARDIA Monday.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman has no further speeches, then?

Mr. STEENERSON. From no gentleman that is here.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I request that the clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] did not hear the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEENERSON. I requested that the gentleman from Tennessee move to rise.

Mr. MOON. I will say this about Mr. LAGUARDIA: If you want to give him time when we get to that section of the bill, we can be liberal with the time and let him speak. We ought to close general debate on this bill now and begin its reading before adjournment.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman agree with me to request 30 minutes for Mr. LAGUARDIA?

Mr. MOON. I, of course, do not object to Mr. LAGUARDIA speaking for 30 minutes at any time.

Mr. STEENERSON. Very well. There is no one else who desires time.

Mr. MOON. It will be under the paragraph of the bill. Of course, the House will have to give consent, but I shall make no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. I have no further time.

The CHAIRMAN. If no one desires to speak, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I understood from my colleague [Mr. STEENERSON] that Mr. LAGUARDIA desired 30 minutes to address the committee on the subject of aeroplanes. I personally consider that one of the most important addresses that this committee has ever listened to or ever will, and I think he made a very suitable request of the gentleman in charge of the bill to rise.

Mr. MOON. "The gentleman in charge of the bill" agreed that the gentleman from New York might have the 30 minutes when we came to the aeroplane proposition.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Well, there will not be anybody here now. I do not like to make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MOON. There is nobody here now.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I know it. The gentleman can move to rise right now and permit Mr. LAGUARDIA to have the time when we meet on Monday.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will it be agreeable to the chairman of the committee that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] may have 30 minutes immediately after the reading of the Journal on Tuesday?

Mr. MOON. I do not care when the gentleman takes the 30 minutes. I wanted to start the reading of the bill by paragraphs. If he wants the 30 minutes at that time or any time during the discussion, I will have no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will prefer that request when we get into the House.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Why does the gentleman select Tuesday?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because this coming Monday is Unanimous-Consent and Suspension Day.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Under the circumstances it seems that that might be a happy solution, but 30 minutes is not enough.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is all the time he requested.

Mr. STEENERSON. How much time have we left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has 30 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Tennessee 37 minutes remaining.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Could not the gentleman from Tennessee add 10 minutes to the amount of time that my colleague has?

Mr. MOON. I will see to it when it comes up. I am generally pretty liberal about those things.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is nothing but information in which, I think, every Member is interested.

Mr. MOON. I understand what he wants to talk about. I have talked with him about it, and I am sure it will be an interesting speech. We have no disposition to shut him off now, but the general debate ought to be closed now. He can address the committee under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. As I understand, the gentleman would make no objection to unanimous consent when we rise that Mr. LAGUARDIA have 45 minutes next Tuesday after the Journal is read to address the House on the subject of aeroplanes in the war?

Mr. MOON. No. That would go 10 minutes beyond the time he is entitled to if we had the speech now.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is entirely satisfactory. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

For gas, electric power and light, and the repair of machinery, United States Post Office Department equipment shops building, $4,500.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be no misunderstanding about the time that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] uses, I understand the motion of the gentleman is to get that time on Tuesday. It is possible that unanimous consent may be exhausted or that the House might agree that we proceed with this bill on Monday. If the gentleman desires to proceed on Monday or Tuesday he could do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. I prefer the unanimous-consent request on behalf of the gentleman from New York, that immediately after the reading of the Journal on Tuesday he be allowed 45 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I understood the gentleman from New York would be here on Monday.

Mr. MOON. There should be no misunderstanding about it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It would be better for Tuesday. The Unanimous Consent Calendar has not been called for a long time and some of the bills might be considered important, and we ought to have a full day. The gentleman has arranged for Tuesday.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is no certainty about how much time will be used on Monday for unanimous-consent business.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee how far he is going to read to-night?

Mr. MOON. I am going to move to rise in a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks at division headquarters, 15, at $1,800 each; 15, at $1,600 each; 20, at $1,400 each; 30, at $1,200 each; 10, at $1,000 each; and 10, at $900 each; in all, $134,000.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13308) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FOCHT, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. BACHARACH, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HAWLEY, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Joseph B. Doan (H. R. 10769), no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to prefer a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the reading of the Journal on Tuesday, not to interfere with conference reports, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] be privileged to speak for 45 minutes on the subject of aviation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that next Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of the business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] be permitted to speak, not to exceed 45 minutes, on the subject of aviation.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I reserve the right to object. Is it Mr. LAGUARDIA himself that wants that amount of time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes it for granted, inasmuch as the gentleman from Wisconsin is asking for it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have been given assurance by the gentlemen acquainted with the situation that the gentleman from New York does wish that amount of time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that he will have to boil down very materially the information he has in order to compress it within 45 minutes, but I am sure he will do it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Is it to be an account of his trip to Europe?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is to cover his experience in aviation in the war.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Is it for or against air mail service?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think it concerns the air mail service. I think it will cover his experience in aviation in the war.

Mr. RAGSDALE. He will give his experience in aviation over there?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] a few moments ago stated that when this bill came up for consideration under the five-minute rule there would be no objection to the gentleman from New York having 45 minutes under a motion to strike out the last word, so that that will give the gentleman from New York the time he desires.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not believe that at this session we should further continue the practice of granting consent for gentlemen to speak, independent of the business before the House, immediately upon the approval of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, as we did during the last session.

I hope the gentleman will not embarrass the situation by insisting upon his request. If my understanding is not correct, I shall not interpose any objection; but I will ask my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] if it was not agreed just a few moments ago that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] should have 45 minutes when this bill is considered under the five-minute rule—that is, that there will be no objection so far as the gentleman is concerned?

Mr. MOON. I agreed that so far as I was concerned there would be no objection of that kind and that the gentleman might have the time whenever he wanted it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Was not the conversation and the understanding that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] was to have this time immediately after the reading of the Journal?

Mr. MOON. I did not so understand; but I want to say that so far as I am concerned I do not object to his having it immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I thoroughly understand that; but the gentleman will recall that while he did not use the language, it was the language that was used and the language that was in the Member's mind when the request was submitted.

Mr. STAFFORD. I distinctly said that I would prefer a request that immediately after the reading of the Journal the gentleman from New York might have 45 minutes. That was before the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] came into the Chamber.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; the gentleman from Tennessee was in the Chamber all the time and heard the agreement that was made.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I will say to the gentleman that the record shows conclusively, without any question, that the understanding was that I was to prefer the request when the committee got into the House, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] should have 45 minutes immediately after the reading of the Journal. To that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] assented.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman from Wisconsin made that statement, and I did not object, and I want to state now that I do not object to that, or to his having 45 minutes at any other time. The fact is that it will be 45 minutes out of the time for considering this bill, and it does not matter when it comes out.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that while his viewpoint respecting many requests of this kind is undoubtedly sound, yet this is a very extraordinary case. A Member of this body, one of the first to leave it to go to war, saw a great deal of extraordinarily interesting experience. Now, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has just stated, it does not matter whether the 45 minutes are used immediately after the reading of the Journal or under the five-minute rule. It is so much time and only so much time. Now, it will be a distinct advantage to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and to the Members, I think, to have this immediately after the reading of the Journal. It will be advertised to come off at that time, there will undoubtedly be a full attendance in the House, and it will happen early in the day. If it is under the five-minute rule, everybody knows that the attendance is more or less uncertain, and the circumstances are certainly not proper. I should think the gentleman would vastly rather have this disposed of in the manner suggested than to have it disposed of by taking 45 minutes under the five-minute rule.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that it was my understanding that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] wanted to speak on the bill about aviation, and that consequently it would be relevant to the discussion of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I say to the gentleman that while there is good ground, as everyone must admit, for the position that he takes, that we should not in this short session grant consent to Members to speak at certain appointed times, yet in this instance there were 35 minutes of general debate remaining on the Republican side and 37 minutes of general debate remaining on the Democratic side. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] was anxious to yield the 35 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. He was here early in the afternoon, but had to leave to go back to New York. The gentleman from Minnesota would have yielded the 35 minutes remaining on this side and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] would have yielded 10 minutes more on his side, but the gentleman from Tennessee was anxious to have the reading of the bill begun so that there would be no further claims for time under general debate, and we arrived at a tentative agreement that on Tuesday, immediately after the reading of the Journal—and in effect using the time remaining in general debate—the gentleman from New York would be accorded 45 minutes, 35 of the time of the gentleman from Minnesota and 10 minutes of the time of the gentleman from Tennessee. That was the understanding, to which there was no dissent at the time it was made.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand that that will be exactly what will occur when the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] will move to strike out the last word and will then speak for 45 minutes. That will give the gentleman from New York his time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman have any objection to this request, that when we next go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] may have 45 minutes in which to discuss aviation?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would have no objection. I will refer that to my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

To make it perfectly clear, I want to say that there is nothing personal to our colleague, Mr. LAGUARDIA, in my attitude about this. But I do not think that during this short session we should arrange for speeches independent of the bills under consideration. We have done that by unanimous consent all during the past session. I do not think we should do it during this session. I do not want, of course, to interfere with the speaking of the gentleman from New York, but I do want it to be upon and under the time agreed upon for consideration of the bills.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is under the time for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If we do not do this we will have many embarrassments arise.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, who has the floor, and what is the subject matter?

The SPEAKER. Nobody has the floor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to exactly acquiesce in the statement of the Speaker. The gentleman from Wisconsin preferred a request for unanimous consent and I reserved the right to object.

The SPEAKER. That was so long ago that the Chair forgot it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. That satisfies my purpose, and I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does not the gentleman think, with his long experience in parliamentary matters, that it is better for a gentleman if he wishes to speak about a post-office matter to discuss it on the Post Office bill, and if he wishes to discuss aviation, to do it on the bill for aviation?

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been the practice for years in the course of general debate for a Member to speak on any subject whatever.

Mr. WINGO. That was before the war, but this is a period of readjustment. Does not the gentleman think that we should readjust parliamentary matters and get out of some of the old ruts?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Minnesota can leave this question to the committee.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that as soon as the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union takes up for further consideration under the five-minute rule the Post Office appropriation bill, after the reading of the first section, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] shall have permission to address the House for a period not exceeding 45 minutes on the subject of aviation.

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, what the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] wants and what he has talked to me about and to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] about and to Mr. MOON about, is that there is an item in the bill providing for aviation, and there is an appropriation for that purpose, and he wants to talk upon that subject when that item is reached. That is what he stated he wanted and what he said and what we agreed with him about. If he will wait until this item is reached, there will be no trouble about the time and no need of making any special arrangement about it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. With all due deference to the information which I am confident that my colleague has, while I am sure the gentleman from New York wants to address himself somewhat to that proposition, I know that he wants to address himself at some length to the subject of aviation in its largest sense. That is what I want to hear him upon and the membership of the House wants to hear him.

Mr. MADDEN. He can do that when the item in regard to aviation is up.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman will permit, nobody knows when that moment will arrive—neither the gentleman from New York nor anyone else. I think it is of sufficient importance that the membership wants to be here, and if it is fixed at that time they will be here. In addition to that, if the time is fixed now, the gentleman from New York will know that he will have it, and if we leave it open we can not tell who might object to it after the first five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not see why the gentleman from New York felt it necessary to go outside of the committee, with whom he was making an arrangement, to get time and have an understanding with a gentleman who is not on the committee. I give you my word that the understanding I had with him was that I would help him get the time when the item was reached.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I beg to assure the gentleman that I have no understanding of any kind with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. I would have no authority in this matter of any kind except to make this request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Sunday, December 15, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

SUNDAY, December 15, 1918.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we are called together in Thy providence that we may accord a national honor to the memory of a distinguished member of this body. We pause in the midst of the pressing duties of these fateful days, and in the golden moments of the holy Sabbath we perform this sacred duty.

It is our obligation to inscribe upon the unperishable honor roll of our departed statesmen the name of the Senator from South Carolina. Thou didst endow him with many qualities of heart and mind that made him a power in our national councils. Passionate in his advocacy of the rights of all men, devoted in his friendships, consistent with the principles which he avowed in his public life.

By his far-sighted statesmanship, by his high sense of honor, by his strong defense of his political creed, he has made his name safe in the annals of American history.

We would not seek to assess the value of such a career. His record is with Thee, to whom we must all turn at last to give an account of our stewardship.

We pray that to-day as we recall his service to his country we may feel the ever-increasing responsibility of representing great sovereign States in this Senate. As we stand in this place of world-wide influence and power we seek the endowment of the spirit of righteousness to direct and control our lives according to the divine will.

We serve our fellowmen in the name and for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore [Mr. SAULSBURY] assumed the chair.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR TILLMAN.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions and ask for their adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

Secretary James M. Baker read the resolutions (S. Res. 388) and they were considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate express its profound sorrow in the death of the Hon. BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate in pursuance of an order heretofore made assembles to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, Senator BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN was born in 1847, which made him just the right age to receive childhood's vivid if exaggerated impression of the epoch-making period immediately preceding and culminating in the Civil War. The incidents and experiences that one must have witnessed and borne during that time, especially at the age of young TILLMAN, must have had a profound effect upon his character and his subsequent attitude as a man toward men and affairs.

The reconstruction period immediately following the war was fraught with more trials, tested more thoroughly the moral, mental, and patriotic fiber of men, than the actual period of the war itself. The struggle of the war itself was terrible, but the object to be attained was worthy of all sacrifice from the standpoint of the South. The orgy of misrule and corruption, during reconstruction times, threatened to engulf and destroy our civilization in that section. Rapine and lust, greed and avarice, in their most revolting form assumed to overrule virtue and decency, honesty and righteousness in both civil and political life.

Prominent amongst those who took part in stemming this unholy tide was young BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN. He did his part in bringing about the dissipation of this hideous nightmare of corruption and misrule, and helped, through the agency of the famous Red Shirt Brigade, to bring about the reestablishment of decent government in South Carolina and the liberation of its homes from the threatened beastly defilement.

When this task was accomplished and South Carolina, like other Southern States, took up her burden of rebuilding the waste places, of gathering together what resources she might in order to retrieve some semblance of the condition that made life tolerable, young TILLMAN also did his part. He, as his family before him had done, settled near Edgefield, S. C., and devoted himself to farming. Perhaps of all the occupations that felt the cruel grind of that period the farmers were the greatest sufferers. He knew at first hand by bitter experience their heritage of hardships, and his first appearance in the arena as a public man was in the advocacy of means looking toward the betterment of the conditions under which the farmer struggled. This first appearance at Bennettsville, S. C., in 1885, was the index to his future public career. His writings and speeches were devoted to the agitation of questions looking toward the betterment of agricultural conditions. In 1890 he became a candidate for governor, and was elected as a representative of the agricultural element of the State. He was reelected in 1892. During his official career as governor he devoted a great deal of time and attention to the establishment of Clemson Agricultural College. This college, as a distinct separate educational institution, was established on the old John C. Calhoun estate, Fort Hill, in Oconee County, S. C. He devoted every available energy to the development and progress of this institution, and lived to see it become one of the foremost agricultural institutions of America.

He also was instrumental in the establishment at Rock Hill, S. C., of the Winthrop Normal and Industrial College for Women. These two institutions are perhaps the most enduring monuments to Senator TILLMAN's devotion to the cause of education, particularly for those classes for whose welfare he had written and worked so hard.

In 1894 he became a candidate for and was elected to the United States Senate to succeed Gen. M. C. Butler. In this capacity as a public man he served until his death.

Some of the most interesting things in connection with Senator TILLMAN's career as a public man were the establishment of the dispensary system in South Carolina for the control of the purchase, manufacture, and sale of whisky by the State. Through subsequent modifications of the law it was finally abolished. In the constitutional convention of 1895 Senator TILLMAN was instrumental in having written into the constitution a prohibition against the manufacture and sale of whisky by private individuals, so that during the modification of the dispensary law it finally became an issue as to local option between the counties as political units being allowed to sell whisky or prohibition. Prohibition finally won. Perhaps the most notable innovation in our political affairs during his career was the inauguration of the primary system for the selection of candidates for the Democratic Party. Senator TILLMAN was prominent in bringing about the adoption of the primary system in South Carolina for the naming of candidates in lieu of the old convention system.

It is interesting to note the subsequent adoption of this plan more or less throughout the country.

As a Senator he made a name for himself as a bold and aggressive debater. His views on public affairs he never hesitated to assert plainly and unequivocally, nor did he hesitate to challenge fearlessly what he did not approve. He loved his State in his own peculiar passionate way and guarded her rights with a fiery zeal characteristic of him. His hold upon the people of South Carolina was without parallel; he appealed to their imagination and dominated the State's political life as perhaps no other individual in her history had done. In a similar sense this was true of his hold upon the American public; that is, in his power to awaken their interest and appeal to their imagination. I knew very little of Senator TILLMAN's domestic life, but from what I was privileged to see of the relation that existed between him and Mrs. Tillman there was often called to my mind, as he himself was fond of quoting, that immortal verse of Burns:

John Anderson my jo, John,
When we were first acquent,
Your locks were like the raven,
Your bonie brow was brent;
But now your brow is beld, John,
Your locks are like the snaw,
But blessings on your frosty pow,
John Anderson my jo!

John Anderson my jo, John,
We clamb the hill thegither,
And monie a cantie day, John,
We've had wi' ane anither:
Now we maun totter down, John,
And hand in hand we'll go,
And sleep thegither at the foot,
John Anderson my jo!

No two have ever lived in the spirit of this poem as Mr. and Mrs. TILLMAN, and the last verse was recalled to my mind whenever I saw them on the street or in their home.

The latter years of Senator TILLMAN's life were shadowed by an affliction which ultimately resulted in his death. The manner in which he bore this affliction was characteristic of the man. He refused to yield the field of his activities because of it, and only succumbed when death laid its hand upon him. He died as he had often expressed a desire to die—actually in harness. His death ended the career of one of the most remarkable characters my State ever produced.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, Senator TILLMAN did not come to the Senate in 1895, as many do, a man unknown beyond the limits of his own State. His reputation preceded his coming. The country had heard about him. The general public knowledge of him was not, perhaps, extensive, but it was distinct and emphatic. To those who looked below the surface it was apparent that here was a man who had wrested control of a famous State from a body of men who, from generation to generation, for 200 years had dominated its politics and its social and economic life. Both at home and in Washington they had brought forth distinguished leaders in public life, who had impressed themselves and their opinions deeply upon the history of the country and made South Carolina a power to be reckoned with throughout the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Whatever their mistakes may have been, however extreme their views, they had been remarkable for ability, courage, and force displayed not only by individuals but by families, whose names and achievements were familiar to all the people of the United States. They had retained their power after the Civil War as it had existed before the great conflict which they had done so much to lead and provoke. Then, as the century closed, they were suddenly overwhelmed and defeated by the forces which rallied behind Senator TILLMAN.

To the mass of the American people who did not fully realize the deeper significance of Senator TILLMAN's victory he was known as the author of the dispensary laws, and his methods of discussion, his "pitchfork," and his reckless frankness in the use of language, of which he had ample command, had made him a picturesque figure and greatly excited public curiosity as to his activities when he reached the Senate. It was for the most part by no means either a friendly or a sympathetic curiosity, but it was both vivid and strong, for it was understood that he intended to revolutionize the Senate, as he had already revolutionized South Carolina.

Senator TILLMAN was neither the first nor the last who has come to the Senate with such a purpose as that attributed to him, and anyone who has studied the history or watched the movements of the Senate for a number of years knows what has happened to those who have come in from another field determined to change the Senate and overturn its ways and methods. The first fact they discover is that the Senate takes a local or State reputation very calmly and is apt to remain undazzled by its beams. Power and reputation in the Senate must be acquired in the Senate itself. The Senate as a body is very tolerant and generous. There is more personal good feeling, less personal animosity, a more complete desire to be considered with each other, and a greater loyalty to the Senate itself and its traditions than in any other legislative body in the world. But on one point the Senate is firm. It declines to be bored. Its method of declination may not be obvious but it is highly effective. The men who have come here proclaiming their intention of revolutionizing and reforming the Senate have fallen in practice into two classes—those who insisted on continuing to attack the Senate and all its habits and methods and those who sooner or later, generally sooner than later, accepted the Senate traditions and ways of life. The former, very few in number, became bores and found themselves unheard and without influence and have been forgotten. The latter have been successful and often distinguished Senators, influential and effective. It is needless to say that Senator TILLMAN belonged preeminently to the second class. He never bored anyone. However widely one might disagree with him he was always and unfailingly interesting. He came not only to accept the Senate but to be one of its most ardent defenders, supporting its rules, habits, and traditions, and very proud of its history and of its power and importance.

This came about through no sacrifice of principle, but simply because he was a man naturally of strong good sense and open to conviction. He startled the country and the Senate at the very outset by an unbridled attack upon President Cleveland, and I think he even then began to see that in the Senate at least this was not the best method to advance the policies or the principles he had at heart. He came to the Senate also with bitter and deep-seated dislike, I will not say prejudice, against all Republicans and all northern men. Nevertheless, among Republicans and northern men he found before many years had passed some of his warmest personal friends. In these last years he one day made a short speech in the Senate in which he admitted that he had been mistaken in these early opinions and that he had in these respects changed his mind. It seemed, I am sure, to those who heard or read what he said an avowal at once manly and touching. But it was something more than this. It showed willingness and ability to learn, admirable and essential capacities throughout life, and especially to be cherished in old age. It also showed the courage to admit that he had been wrong, and this is a loftier and rarer attribute and a very fine quality indeed.

But if Senator TILLMAN learned to know the Senate and his fellow Senators better and to like them better as the years passed, the Senate also learned much about him. Everyone was aware that he was able, forceful, and possessed of unbounded energy. But Senators found also that the blunt words and the stormy manner when he was roused were far more in evidence in public than in private life. Behind all this was a kindly nature, plenty of humor, a serious outlook on life, and real sincerity of purpose. One at least of those who came in the process of time to know him well discovered that Senator TILLMAN had knowledge of and genuine fondness for literature and poetry—good literature and good poetry be it said—and above all that he was a lover of Shakespeare, a phase of his character not generally appreciated. He was a conspicuous and active Senator for many years and worked hard and faithfully until he was stricken by illness some years ago. After his partial recovery he went on with an uncomplaining and unfailing courage which commanded everyone's admiration until the end came. Never did he appear better than in his attitude toward the war. He never had any doubts. He recognized what Germany meant, and he was for the right and for the war with all his strength. During these years of physical trial and endurance he turned more than ever toward the friends with whom he had been long in service, and grew ever gentler and more kindly. The affection and sympathy which I think he craved, for he had an emotional nature, were freely given. After a long day of many conflicts the evening was calm and peaceful. As I talked with him and watched him amid the lengthening shadows when the sun of life was slowly setting I often thought of Dr. Holmes's lines written for his own seventieth birthday:

> Still as the silver cord gets worn and slender,
> Its lightened task-work tugs with lessening strain,
> Hands get more helpful, voices grown more tender
> Soothe with their softened tones the slumberous brain.
> So when the iron portal shuts behind us,
> And life forgets us in its noise and whirl,
> Visions that shunned the glaring noonday find us,
> And glimmering starlight shows the gates of pearl.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, Senator TILLMAN was one of the most striking and picturesque characters in the public life of America. No one interested or attracted the attention of the public more than he. His mental qualities and his physical appearance were each peculiarly fascinating. He possessed a strong, robust, and compact body; a firm, decisive step; large, expansive, and magnificent brow; clear, dark, and fearless eyes; firm and resolute mouth and chin, indicative of unflinching courage and resolution. He had a somber, serious aspect, which could scarcely conceal the fierce flames of passion and conviction which surged beneath. In speaking, he made very few gestures, but occasionally emphasized a point by a peculiar gesture of arm and finger, which always left a profound impression upon his hearers. His strong physical personality always left upon his auditors, whether of the Senate or public assembly, a most favorable impression. He had a strong, clear, and penetrating voice, falling pleasantly on the ears, never monotonous because frequently tinged with sarcasm or resounding with indignation. These large physical advantages, combined with his mental qualities, made him one of the most effective speakers of his day. I have heard few public speakers who could sway and hold a great audience better than Senator TILLMAN. Wherever he went in the United States large assemblages greeted him enthusiastically and applauded uproariously his bold, striking utterances. In the days of his health and vigor he was one of the most effective debaters in the Senate. Well do I recall, when I was a Member of the House of Representatives, the frequent debates between Senator TILLMAN and Senator Spooner, which crowded the Chamber with Members of the House and the galleries with interested spectators. During his long service in the Senate few of its Members engaged in more important debates than he—few participated in discussing subjects of such large range and variety. He was well informed on all matters, ranging from the smallest to those of paramount importance. In discussing them he displayed accurate knowledge, logical and patriotic conclusions.

Senator TILLMAN came to the United States Senate after he had had a most remarkable and successful career as governor of his State. He had attained political supremacy in South Carolina only after fierce conflict and unremitting combat. He had won at home by the strength of battle—not the art of diplomacy. His methods were those of the fighting warrior, and not those of the negotiating diplomat. This characterized alike his political career in the Senate. He boldly proclaimed at all times his convictions and conclusions, willing to stand or fall on their acceptance or rejection. He indulged in no equivocation, no evasion. He was bold, clear, and defiant, possessing the rare quality of complete intellectual integrity. He did not shirk going to the utmost limit dictated by his convictions and conclusions. This rugged, sterling integrity obtained for him the full confidence of his people. However much others may have differed with Senator TILLMAN, they knew he but gave utterance to his honest convictions. This gave him strength and brought to him a following which no charm of eloquence or intellectual adroitness could ever obtain. Thus all through his political life he builded on the solid foundation of courage and candor. Fear of consequences never made him fail to answer a roll call in the Senate. His integrity was such that when he made a mistake, and later realized it, he never sought refuge in evasion, but frankly and boldly confessed his error.

His intellectual integrity was only equaled by his great moral integrity. Throughout his long political career no stain followed his footsteps—no scandal tarnished his fame. Any corrupt scheme that sought to covertly wind its way through the Senate ever encountered a most vigilant and inveterate foe in Senator TILLMAN. Special privileges and favoritism always found in him a persistent enemy. His service to this country in this respect was invaluable.

His rugged, sterling honesty was one of Senator TILLMAN'S most splendid qualities. Honesty is the greatest of virtues, around which all others cling; without it they wither and fall in dust and weeds.

Mr. President, Senator TILLMAN'S legislative achievements were extensive and most useful to his country. He was a most industrious worker and legislator. He was constant in his attendance in the Senate, active and energetic as a committee worker. He was the recipient not many years ago of a striking indication of the very high regard and esteem in which he was held by his colleagues when legislation for the regulation of railroads was put under his control and management, although a majority of the Members of the Senate at that time were of opposite political faith. In the management of this measure he displayed parliamentary skill, eloquence, and great information.

His greatest work in the Senate was that which appertained to his duties as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which he was for some time chairman. He labored incessantly in committee and on the floor of the Senate to make the American Navy sufficiently large and efficient to discharge its responsibilities. His efforts were untiring in this direction. To the accomplishment of this task, which was so dear to his heart, he brought all his rugged strength and pertinacity. Having been closely associated with him in this work, ranking next to him on this committee, I desire to bear testimony to his usefulness and invaluable service. He aided most potentially in having the American Navy properly prepared, and thus made possible its achievements in the war with Germany. The country will ever owe him a large debt of gratitude for his work in this direction. When Senator TILLMAN died the American Navy lost a strong and powerful friend.

Mr. President, my association with Senator TILLMAN was so close and intimate that I was not only cognizant of his splendid qualities as a public man but I was also fully aware of his excellence as a private individual. His private life was moral, clean, lovable, and honorable. He possessed in a preeminent degree strong moral character and integrity. He scorned duplicity and falsehood, loathing a lie. He fearlessly and scrupulously spoke the truth—sometimes almost brutally. I never knew a more tender, devoted husband; a kinder, better father. As a friend, he was steadfast and loyal. Like "Old Hickory" Jackson, his rugged character was knitted together by the strong fibers of friendship and fidelity. Of him it may be said, as was said of "Old Hickory" Jackson, "He never failed a friend, never forgot a favor."

Mr. President, in the death of Senator TILLMAN this country has sustained a great loss. In these trying hours our country needs strong, rugged characters like him, men whose broad and brave shoulders can securely bear national burdens. Our pressing need now is not beautiful and fragrant flowers, but old, gnarled oaks like Senator TILLMAN, to bear the present coming storm and stress. We do not now need eloquent and pleasing Ciceros to gloze over vice and evil and conceal dangers. We need fearless Catos, like Senator TILLMAN, to point out wrong, expose iniquity, and fearlessly meet dangers and difficulties.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in 1876 the so-called "carpetbag" and negro-rule government, which had come as a result of the close of the Civil War, in South Carolina was overturned, and the political power in the State fell into the hands of the survivors of that political aristocracy which had been in power in the years preceding the Civil War. The men who thus came into power, many of them prominent Confederate officers, continued in control of the political affairs of the State until 1890—a period of 14 years.

In the meantime a spirit of restlessness had arisen among the middle classes, or the so-called "common people," of the State, against the rule of this old-time political aristocracy. This culminated in a movement among the farmers, who formed the farmer organization of the State.

Senator TILLMAN became one of the leaders in this movement, and became a candidate for governor under the auspices and with the support of this farmer organization. It was a drastic and bitter campaign which ensued between the "old guard" and the "new guard" under the leadership of TILLMAN. He was the central figure and the moving spirit of the great political battle from which he emerged victorious at all points.

This was followed by another drastic political campaign in 1892, in which TILLMAN was again a candidate for governor, and in which he was reelected after a very hot and exciting campaign. And finally in 1894 he was elected United States Senator after a bitter and spirited fight, defeating one of the prominent leaders of the old régime.

TILLMAN'S victories in these campaigns were so complete that the elements which he and his followers vanquished have never since regained the power they had previously held.

The administration of TILLMAN as governor was on the whole and in the main successful and progressive. He was instrumental in bringing about many important reforms and improvements for the welfare of the State. While he was inclined to be somewhat domineering and drastic in his ways, yet on account of his honesty and sincerity and on account of the wisdom of his measures he was looked upon with favor and became popular among the great masses of the State, and that popularity he retained in full measure until the day of his death.

While Senator TILLMAN had not had the advantages of a full college education, he had, nevertheless, been well trained in one of the academic schools of his State, where he was in attendance for upward of three years. But whatever deficiency there may have been in the training of the schools he more than made up in after life. He was a great reader and a great student, and he confined his readings and his studies largely to classical works of the highest order. He was a wonderful man in energy and perseverance, never at a standstill, always moving ahead, always seeking new worlds to conquer.

Mr. President, it came to pass that he and I took the oath of office and entered the Senate on the same day—the 4th of March, 1895. We soon became intimate friends, and that friendship continued until the time of his death. While at first he seemed somewhat crusty and abrupt, yet I soon discovered that this was but the outer shell of a kind and generous heart and a vigorous and active mind. When he entered the Senate he was a veteran of many a hard-fought political battle, and this had developed in him a belligerent attitude on many public questions, which at times seemed to make him rather impatient of opposition. But, however this might be, everyone recognized his integrity and honesty of purpose, and no one could doubt his earnestness and sincerity. As a rule, there was with him no middle ground; a measure was to him either right or wrong, and hence he was most persistent and vigorous in his advocacy or in his opposition. When he was actively enlisted in a cause there was no truce; the battle must be vigorously fought to the end.

I remember well the first great speech he made in the Senate. It seemed to me to come from a heart full of the evolutions in which he had taken part in his own State. There were many unique phrases and idioms in his speech which gave evidence of this, but on the whole his speech indicated to me that he was at heart sound and that he would zealously labor for the best interests of our common country.

As the years went by he became a good sound debater, more moderate in tone and more charitable to his opponents, and many of his early idiosyncrasies disappeared. He became a ready debater and could take and give blows as effectively as any Senator in this body. His oratory was not of the glittering kind that dealt in lofty and high-sounding periods, but rather of the kind that struck sledge-hammer blows at the heart of the question. He took no pains to sugar coat the points he made. Because of his earnestness and sincerity, and because of his avoidance of all ornament, he became a most powerful advocate or a most dangerous opponent. Above all things he believed in calling things by their right names, and if a scholarly name was not found he would evoke an idiom or phrase current among the people, but not always found in the books, which would oftentimes in its very peculiarity furnish a most potent argument.

Prior to the misfortune which befell him through a stroke of apoplexy he was one of the most energetic and hard-working Members of the Senate, participating in the debates on all important and leading questions. He took a leading part in securing the enactment of the amendatory interstate commerce act of 1906, which gave the Interstate Commerce Commission for the first time the rate-making power, a power that had been sought for, both by the commission and by the great mass of the people, for many years. I well remember the persistency with which he labored in this cause, and the helpful and effective work he did in that behalf.

He was much sought for as a lecturer, in the Northern States especially, on account of his ultra views on the so-called "race question." His discussion of this question was always illuminating and instructive; and while his audiences may not always have agreed with his views yet he always secured a large attendance of good listeners, who, to say the least, were interested in hearing his views on his side of the case.

He was always kind and considerate toward his fellow Senators, and on his lecture tours, if the occasion arose, he would always say a good word for his colleagues, whether they belonged to his party or not.

He was emphatically, in the true sense of the word, a progressive—a progressive in the sense that, although the old may have proved satisfactory, yet if anything new developed, which he found to be better, he was ready and swift to seize upon it.

He was in all things loyal and faithful to the interests and welfare of his State and to the interests and welfare of our common country. He had no patience with shams nor with glittering generalities, and in his debates he gave no mercy to either.

South Carolina has been represented by many able, cultured, and highly educated men in this body, men who commanded attention here and elsewhere; and while Senator TILLMAN may not have had the culture or the gifts of oratory of some of his predecessors, yet I doubt whether any of them rendered more effective and beneficial service in this vineyard of the people to his State and to our common country than did he.

He was an active dynamo in the moral and intellectual world, that gave ample evidence of a brave heart and a strong soul—tireless in the performance of his duties. A Senate composed of such men as TILLMAN would never go far astray and would always be apt to listen to the demands of the people for necessary constructive and remedial legislation.

Had he lived he would, no doubt, have been returned to the Senate by practically a unanimous vote of the people of his State, but the fates willed otherwise. And while he is with us no more, the public spirit which he infused into the political, social, and economic life of his State still survives, and his memory will be cherished for years to come as one of the most beloved sons of South Carolina.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, among those whose fortune it is to contribute a word upon this sublime as well as solemn occasion, to me is given the privilege of expressing a heart's feeling, a thought.

These proceedings, Mr. President, are designated as obituaries. The general mankind, reading of them in the public press, is inclined to the idea that they are a mere formal proceeding, established by custom, and observed in their repetition merely that we might comply with some senatorial courtesy. Others feel, Mr. President, that they are something like a surcease of the political quarrels of the past, and are in the form of a universal forgiveness, while we robe the dead with the consideration we decline them while they live. Partisan conflicts are believed to have been so bitter in this Chamber that time never heals their wounds, nor any form of personal gift of the combatant or charm of manner in individuals ameliorates the asperities that were exhibited in the combat.

Too many assume that these proceedings but envelop with a genial glow the closing chapter of some life where before partisanship had shrouded in gloom. It is not true. It is regretful that the public should have an estimate of that nature. There is no rule of this body which calls upon a Senator to pay his respects to a dead comrade. There is no obligation upon him other than that which applies from man to man in any avenue of life. Utterances such as will be embalmed, sir, in a volume kept as a monument of memory of the deceased are volunteer expressions of admiration and heartfelt praise. We must note the tributes from such men as these two distinguished leaders of one of the great parties of our Nation—one from the East, in the classic scholar, Mr. LODGE, of Massachusetts; one from the West, in the great, strong, sturdy nature of NELSON, of Minnesota. Sir, these are not born out of courtesy, nor do they spring out of mere observance of custom. They were the overflowings of a heart that had become convinced by close association of the merit of the man. They were inspired by that impulse of justice which speaks out here and voices the sentiment to all now living who knew the dead TILLMAN as the living statesman may know how thus his rivals in politics, his opponents in conflict, and more, sir, oftentimes his enemies in party warfare remember him and appraise him as a man.

I have often thought, Mr. President, that when contributions have come, such as from these distinguished gentlemen of our side, called democratic, toward Democrats, they would be accepted only as a tribute of party associates and regarded as a favor that was due one to whom the party associations have for a while been tender and fraternal; but it is not known to the public that even among ourselves very serious differences often exist as to ways and means and as to methods and objects and likewise, sir, among us the contribution or tribute is never tendered from mere favor or form. It is only spoken because of that conviction of truth, that sense of desert, that solemn justice we owe that deserving man, whoever he is.

Mr. President, if it were in my power, I would abolish our prevailing method of giving obituary—delaying the tribute until convenient time. I would invoke in this body that other rule prescribing that when the solemn announcement of the death of a comrade came to us, and there were those disposed to speak of his qualities and deserts, I would have that duty discharged then. I would not have it so lapse that the memory of him would be dimmed by after events, and those who had known him intimately deprived of the word that could be spoken by those of close familiarity and fresh memory. Yet, after all, I am inclined, sir, as I speak, to another thought. This lapse of time must impress the public with the sincerity of these utterances. Many events have happened since this distinguished man was laid to rest among his friends. Swirling clouds of war flashed with flames of fire, portions of the earth ripped apart, kings toppled, monarchs crushed, while dynasties have passed into the aftermath, to be remembered only as a thing to be despised or to be mourned. Only a strong man, Mr. President, who had impressed his personality greatly upon the soul of man, could have been remembered during such times as these and could have invoked from men the expression so firm in praise and so strong in love as that which has come from these who have spoken to-day of this one man—TILLMAN.

Only great merits of such a man carved in deeds upon the hearts of his fellows could have been reflected after such events. The ordinary man, to whom a tribute out of courtesy would have been given, would have been forgotten in such an hour. It is only a great star shining among planets, whose light could illume through such darkness amid which we have lived. Only the attributes of the great, sir, who have remained to reflect their glory upon mankind in such scenes as those which, amid fire and death, and universal carnage, still survive. And if the time has lapsed—which I deplore—from custom, it is to be said that in this particular instance it has served as a test of this man's great deserts. It must now be certified that amid it all and through it all still he could remain an ever-gleaming light, pouring its radiance about the hearts of his friends and reflecting again that splendid flame of character of this dead master. It must ever live as a beacon to guide the children of the State he honored with his sublime service.

Sir, Senator TILLMAN was, as these distinguished Senators have said, but a plain man; and yet what greater men have we among greatness than those who are plain men? We recall for a second the lines that Tennyson translated from the heart of that returning statesman, who from an humble farmer to premier found himself in his boyhood village. After a career of greatness in public life, he returns to where once he followed a plowshare. He looks about him, and musing stands:

> Dost thou look back on what hath been,
> As some divinely gifted man,
> Whose life in low estate began
> And on a simple village green.
> Who breaks his birth's invidious bar,
> And grasps the skirts of happy chance,
> And breasts the blows of circumstance
> And grapples with his evil star.

Ah, behold! That is the "pillar of a people's hope," and the "center of a world's desire."

Sir, what was the object of this man, BEN TILLMAN, citizen of the United States? Mr. President, my mother's family was from the State of South Carolina. They were the Hamiltons—I am carrying their name. The mere suggestion indicates to you, sir, that I was necessarily interested in the State from the earliest time of my life and that I must ever be interested in the affairs of its men. I left the South very early, and found my home in the West, and have remained a western man. I entered the House of Representatives in 1897, and had the delight to serve with such comrades as I see sitting about me—the eminent Senator, now chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, succeeding Senator TILLMAN, Mr. SWANSON of Virginia, whose public service has been shown in so many characters and in so many high places of civilization; also the distinguished Senator from Colorado, Mr. SHAFROTH, whose contribution in all things to the welfare of his country is praised by those who know him. I can recall that it was one of our occupations, when we were not busy in the House, to come over to the Senate when we heard that TILLMAN of South Carolina was to engage in some form of debate or conflict. As the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Minnesota have well said, he attracted attention from the mere fact that he was to speak.

Mr. President, let me say, sir, on this solemn occasion, yet, sir, with all the deliberation it commands, it was not so important in those days as to how he said that which he did; it mattered not in what words these phrases should be graced; nor particularly, sir, does it dwell now upon the mind of man as to whether they disclosed college education, the finish of literary adornment, or the perfection of phraseology. It was that the man felt justice; it was that his constant struggle in life was to do that justice to man; it was that the very soul about him surged and beat to the single purpose of having justice done by his Government, aye, to its humblest citizen, and for this, to this, and through this he spoke.

Mr. President, I have lived through two epochs in this Government when to my mind, reflecting the lessons which the page of history gave me, there was suggested time and time again how near my country was on the verge of a civil revolution. One of those, sir, was in the years when I first came into public life, following 1896—in the year 1897. It was at the end, sir, of what was called a Democratic administration. Without regard to what might be said to be the right or wrong of measures which were then in force, or, sir, of the policies which were then invoked, it is sufficient to recall for a moment that there was a public mind throughout the land which, because of financial distresses, and not understanding the causes that brought them forth, was on the eve of overturning all of the fixed institutions of our fabric, and would have been content to do so in any form that should have presented itself to their successful undertaking. Do you realize, Senators, that but for such men as Ben Tillman, who was understood to represent the humble people, to speak for the great rights of civilization, to speak for that great mass of mankind who find themselves squirming beneath the feet of men—that but for such as he, in whom that class had confidence and felt he was for them—the people—this land of ours never could have escaped the fate that has followed all other lands since history threw its light on civilization under similar circumstances—revolution?

It was the manner of such a man, the expressions of such a man, the purpose of such a man and of his kind wherever they were, sir, which saved the Republic of the United States, and held it firm to the center of its purpose, a peaceful government of the people, by the voice of the people. He therefore, sir, contributed a great service to the Republic. Without being conscious of it, and perchance without having it in his purpose, he was one of the few who cemented our country again together when it was about to part like a ship in the mad waves of a vengeful sea.

When men shall come to consider such a man, may we not recall the atmosphere in which he lived, the time in which he spoke, the conditions he met, the remedies he offered, and the result of his contributions? By these may he not be measured? And since the tendency of us all is to look to smaller things in human life and by this diminish the real measure of greatness in the altogether, we may appeal to future history, and shall consider this great truth, to recall what was the results and the sure effect of such a life as he lived, such offerings as he gave, such services as he brought to his land in such an hour as they were given.

Mr. President, there was another period which fell to the peril of insurrection with what was called Republican administration. This was in the fall of 1912. It began in the spring of 1912, following the year 1911, culminating in a spirit in this land of a political upheaval partaking of resentment against party arrangement and party organization, and against every form of established government. Had there not been strong men on all sides to come forth at such a time and point out where the real evil was and how it could be remedied by the people themselves, there would have been a revolution in America. There was a spirit in the land that cared nothing for ancient institutions, that knew neither the fathers of the past nor recked of their glory. Sir, this and other reasons similar to that in effect which followed immediately what was known as the Cleveland administration, produced a situation that promised to overturn the courts on one hand, to dispense with all our forms of legislation throughout and end in the wreck and ruin of our form of civilization.

One can only conjecture what might have followed had it not been for the course of honest, faithful, strong-hearted men, who arose and spoke the truth without fear, placed the evil where it belonged, and registered responsibility at its just place and spoke the real remedy for the wrong endured. Tillman was one, and here in this Chamber his voice could be heard long after the expiration of 1896. Twenty years of public life had not changed his creed or modified the sincere, patriotic effort he made for mankind. He was one of its legislative saviors.

Senators have said and rightfully that men serving on this floor with each other become mollified; that they become softened; that the spirit of attack vanishes; that party contest wanes. One stands like a vestal near the flame with the swinging incense of friendship perfuming every conflict. But, sir, however true that may be, and doubtless is—and long may it continue, that we may ever be prepared for that last day when we speak the word for our friends—still, sir, as to this man neither fear of men nor partisanship of politics nor favor from his own nor affections of home ever moved him from his conviction.

Nor, sir, did the beckon of riches or the opportunity of wealth seduce him from his firm sense of right, and when he began his undertaking for men he remained true to the end. It was because of the confidence of the multitude in such men, in whom they beheld the rock around whom the vine might entwine in beauty yet remain fixed in unshaken strength. Truly, sir, his voice and character was the rock of our salvation. When we reflect upon this we can but slightly measure the service such a man does a country such as ours, founded upon the will of the people and only abiding in the faith the people have in the honesty of men.

Senators have referred to the last days of this distinguished statesman. Mr. President, in civil government his decree was justice to men, in war the duty of patriots. From neither did he ever veer. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has well said, his eye was fixed to see through the long distance the great danger that was upon us in a later hour. He did not parley with it; he did not compromise with it nor smother its expression from fear in any quarter. His was again the drawn ax, that he might smite the head of the foe when raised to endanger his country.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] well spoke of Senator TILLMAN'S efforts in behalf of the Navy. The distinguished head of the Navy, the Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Josephus Daniels, who bore the great burden in such hour, is here sitting with us. He found no aid greater, none stronger, none more patriotic, and none more sure and more uncompromising in his championship than this chairman of the Naval Committee.

Mr. President, I know the South. It was not easy for BEN TILLMAN in time of peace to stand here in support of a large Navy. He came from a State whose people were carefully considerate, among whom were few millionaires. The rich were the exception. They were inclined by nature and from a Commonwealth of past conviction inclined to resent on the part of their public servant unnecessary appropriations that would bring large taxes and heavy burdens upon their people and their earnings. No one knew this more than TILLMAN. He knew this necessarily attracted about himself a possible political opposition from which he might have to pay that penalty which public men pay for outrunning their constituents and guiding instead of following them.

But, nevertheless, sir, he did not make measure of that event. The duty of his whole country was the sole standard to him. He was willing to trust the intelligence of South Carolina. He knew her humble people as he did her superior people, and that if he were to go to them with the truth, it would be the truth that would not only make them free but save him from any injustice which might otherwise befall him. It was that feature of independence in politics that characterized him, so different from any men around him, and which justify on this day these attributes of praise which are so willingly and sweetly rendered by these his comrades who were a generation and more in public life with him.

Mr. President, I knew him as a friend. I did not hesitate to go to him for counsel. To him I had no pride in confessing blunders, which of course in all men's lives are many. I never knew a man to whom I could go with greater hope for consolation and for a sure sense of guardianship than to this man TILLMAN. It is because of this that I recall it. My sense of obligations is but different from that of his other dear comrades. I knew him as a friend, and as such I mourn him and miss him.

But, Mr. President, there was one thought which I can not omit. Those who knew him closely would ever be impressed with his Christianity. There was about TILLMAN a sense of responsibility to God and Heaven to which he felt he would some day make his last return. Sir, whatever else might have been, when that time came there would be nothing for him to seek to hide. There would be nothing which he need seek excuse from his fellow mankind. His religion was to him consoling, ever guiding and ever inspiring him. His religion was faith in God, his belief the teachings of Christ, his creed love for his fellow mankind.

This is all, sir, that nursed him through those days of illness which distinguished Senators have alluded to; it consoled him in such hour as he was by his affectionate and tender wife, who never tired, and his children about, who never wearied in their service for him. He clung to life as a duty to them. Many times we have seen him here when we knew his oppressed physical condition would not permit or justify it, yet out of duty to those around him, at the sacrifice of physical comfort, he would ever be with us in the discharge of the duty he owed to God and to man. Where will we find in after days a nobler example for men to pattern by than such a character?

Mr. President, South Carolina has contributed many great men to the world of circumstance in America, and she has inscribed in perpetual history such memorial as time affords to the names of great heroes and wondrous statesmen familiar to us. We recall them easily. John C. Calhoun was a master of sophistry, a philosopher of government—in the science of it as it is written. Hammond was distinguished by reason of something of the insistence on that class distinction which prevailed too long in the South and to her great injury; Butler, the example of noblesse oblige. In his personality he ever commanded respect and admiration. Hampton personified the valor of the soldier and the character of those who gave much of life for what they believed and could not understand the difference of another as against them or as neglectful of all their people's sacrifice.

But in TILLMAN there was the philospoher of government—that government that meant justice to all men equally wherever possible under the law. There was the courtly gentleman who knew not how to swerve from duty, with the courage of the soldier, a courage which never shrank in an undertaking, that meant the preservation of the country and the maintenance of its honor. He passed through all the stages represented by all others and in himself personified their virtues. In these days of great victories where they have been garnered by other men with every opportunity of favor or partiality, BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN leaves in his life and memory a monument of achievement over all obstacles to which after generations of his State will ever point with pride and glory, one which will inspire all children to noble efforts, and put upon their lips a chorus of praise in the coming day and in after time in the new regeneration of this, our Republic. Those who knew him will praise God that our world could produce such a man as BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN.

Mr. POLLOCK. Mr. President, in all ages and amongst all civilized peoples it has been an honored custom for the living to pay tribute to the dead, and so to-day we are met here in response to that custom to pay a meed of tribute to the memory of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, whose seat I now have the honor to occupy.

The first ballot that it was ever my privilege, as a citizen of South Carolina, to cast for governor of my State was cast for BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN in 1892. The first ballot that it was ever my privilege, as a member of the General Assembly of South Carolina, to cast for United States Senator from my State was cast for the distinguished American Senator to whose memory we would to-day pay tribute.

Occupying the same seat that he so well and ably filled for nearly 24 years, succeeding him for a short time by the suffrage of the same people whom he loved so well, called upon by the people of South Carolina—his people and mine—to complete the service which they had intrusted to him, I must confess to a deep sense of my inability to pay full tribute to him as well as confess to my inability to render a service in this body comparable with the great record which he made for himself, his State, and his country, which has placed him in the front rank of not only the greatest of Carolina statesmen, but also amongst the greatest statesmen that our whole country has produced in its nearly 150 years of national existence.

The life and career of Senator TILLMAN should be an inspiration to the young manhood of America which has not had a full chance in the race of life. Coming on the scene of action immediately after the great Civil War, when his State was prostrate, his people poor, his opportunities circumscribed, without means and without educational facilities, he was compelled to work by day and study by night. He soon realized that the poor man without education fought an unequal fight, and he undertook to educate himself by study and reading whenever time permitted. Denied the education of a college, he turned to the university of hard knocks and hard work, and for many years he toiled to support his father's family and to store up knowledge of men and affairs. Living and making a living on a poor farm in South Carolina, under most adverse circumstances, he realized the hard lot of the poor and unfortunate, and it seems to me that then it was he must have read the words of Charles Dickens:

> If ever household affections and loves are graceful things, they are graceful in the poor. The ties that bind the wealthy and the proud to home may be forged on earth, but those which link the poor man to his humble hearth are of the truer metal and bear the stamp of Heaven. The man of high descent may love the halls and lands of his inheritance as a part of himself, as trophies of his birth and power; his associations with them are associations of pride and wealth and triumph; the poor man's attachment to the tenements he holds, which strangers have held before and may to-morrow occupy again, has a worthier root, struck deep into purer soil. His household goods are of flesh and blood, with no alloy of silver, gold, or precious stone; he has no property but in the affections of his own heart; and when they endear bare floors and walls, despite of rags and toil and scanty fare, that man has his love of home from God, and his rude hut becomes a solemn place.

His love of home, of wife, of children, his beautiful home life that he learned to live while he was yet poor and obscure, is evidence that the great novelist knew the real human heart, and it seems to me that in his early life our lamented friend must have breathed the same spirit that the same author expressed when he said:

> Oh! if those who rule the destinies of nations would but remember this—if they would but think how hard it is for the very poor to have engendered in their hearts that love of home from which all domestic virtues spring, when they live in dense and squalid masses where social decency is lost, or, rather, never found—if they would but turn aside from the wide thoroughfares and great houses and strive to improve the wretched dwellings in byways where only poverty may walk—many low roofs would point more truly to the sky than the loftiest steeple that now rears proudly up from the midst of guilt and crime and horrible disease to mock them by its contrast.

With such an inspiration BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN must have been filled when he went out from his humble home and obscure place to lead the ignorant and the poor out into the bright light and clear sunshine of equal opportunity and freedom, and commenced to teach them anew the truth that Jefferson had written in the immortal Declaration of Independence, "That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that amongst these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these, governments are instituted amongst men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

With this in mind he must have carried on his memorable campaign of education amongst the masses of the people of South Carolina and taught them how to vote in order that they might conduct their government in the interest of the whole people. About 1885 Mr. TILLMAN commenced a crusade, first through the press and later from the platform, to secure for the impoverished people of South Carolina better conditions of living.

The first speech that he ever delivered in public, in so far as I know, was delivered at Bennettsville, S. C., in the summer of 1885, and I well remember as a boy of 15 years of age hearing that speech in company with my father. Mr. TILLMAN was unused to public speech and had a prepared speech to read, but he had not proceeded far in a most awkward reading of it when he became disgusted with the attempt and threw his manuscript aside and launched out hesitatingly in the delivery of an extemporaneous speech which soon gained impetus and carried his audience with him. I shall never forget the expression of my father as we left the courthouse when he so well expressed my own youthful sentiments: "That man is a diamond in the rough," and so he afterwards demonstrated, but as time passed on the rough diamond was polished and smoothed and became the brightest jewel in the political crown of South Carolina, and one of the most brilliant stars in the American Nation.

The masses of the people had taken but little part in the political affairs of the State; he educated them to a realization of their rights and obligations. They had but poor educational advantages; he educated them to the idea that they were entitled to an education at the hands of the public. They had no college for the farmers' boys where they could educate the future farmers of the State; he builded Clemson College. They had no college for the young women of the State, and he caused Winthrop College for women to be builded. Each of these institutions now enrolls more than 1,000 students, and they stand as perpetual monuments to Gov. B. R. TILLMAN. Tens of thousands of young men and young women have received an education at these institutions which otherwise they could not have received, and their lives of usefulness are living pages in the book of life of Gov. TILLMAN.

He builded up the common schools, and so improved them that now a school is in the reach of practically every boy and girl within the State, as adequate, possibly, as the average State can afford.

He caused a better system of analysis and inspection of fertilizers, and so prevented the practice of mammoth frauds on the farmers of the State.

He contributed largely to the adoption of the primary election system of nominating all officials, and thereby gave equal rights and privileges to all. He caused a constitutional convention to be held, and it adopted a constitution which greatly improved the organic law of the State and preserved for the time being the Anglo-Saxon civilization of the State. He grappled with the liquor evil, as then exercised through open bar rooms, and realizing the necessity for the backing of public opinion, which was then not ripe for prohibition, instituted the system of State owned and controlled dispensaries, which subsequently became corrupt, but which paved the way for abolition of the whisky traffic in South Carolina.

All these things were accomplished only after the hardest and bitterest of political conflicts—bitter because he was bitterly opposed and criticized; hard, because the opposition to Mr. TILLMAN was led by many of the best and brainiest men in the State who had controlled its policies and destinies and who could not see that a new day had dawned in the State.

In 1890 a preliminary convention of the representatives of the reform faction of the Democratic Party, headed by Mr. TILLMAN, was held in March, and this convention nominated a full State ticket, with Mr. TILLMAN as its candidate for governor, to be run for the regular Democratic nomination, and provided for a joint debate at each county seat between the candidates so put forward and any other candidates that might offer. Some of the most brilliant men in South Carolina joined issue with Mr. TILLMAN in the campaign, but his brilliant intellect, his keen wit, his ready retort, and his great learning were equal to every demand, and he carried the election with a tremendous majority and received the Democratic nomination. Bitter attacks were made on him, and this bitterness brought forth bitterness in return; but when the campaign was over he was ready to say, as Grant said after Appomattox, "Let us have peace." But not so. The opposition put out an independent candidate against him, but he was elected by an overwhelming majority, carrying every county in the State. He has since had the opportunity to pay a remarkable tribute to his competitor for the Democratic nomination for governor in his first race for governor, the Hon. Joseph H. Earle, who was subsequently his colleague in the Senate for a short time, and this tribute paid on the floor of the Senate shows that Mr. TILLMAN could fight a good fight, a hard fight, a bitter fight with a worthy antagonist and yet retain the respect of that man and at the same time retain a high regard for the virtues of an honorable antagonist, and such his antagonist was in 1890.

In 1892 he was a candidate for reelection as governor of South Carolina, and he was opposed in the primaries by that brilliant orator and courtly gentleman, ex-Gov. John C. Shepherd; and again Mr. TILLMAN had an antagonist worthy of the best, but so strongly was he intrenched in the hearts of the great masses of the people that he was reelected governor of his State for another term, during which he retained his wonderful hold on the regard and affections of his people, so that at the expiration of his second term as governor he was able, after a memorable campaign, to defeat the gallant Matthew Calbraith Butler, who had so well and so long served his State in peace and in war; and thus began his great senatorial career.

I shall not dwell at length on the record made by Senator TILLMAN in this body. Many of you who served with him know that record more intimately than I do. Some of you remember the inexperienced legislator who came here with his pitchfork. You saw him in action, you heard him in debate, you counseled with him in conference, and you had the opportunity of learning the massiveness of his intellect, the bigness of his heart, his desire to serve his party, his State, and his Nation.

When others left the Democratic Party, believing that the interests of the people could be better served through the Populist Party, he kept his followers within the Democratic Party and tried to make that party more truly representative of the masses of the people; where evils had crept into his own party he did not hesitate to point them out and seek to correct them. When the Republican Party was in power he did not hesitate to join issue with them in any matter that did not comport with his sense of civic righteouness, and some of his speeches on the great political problems of the past quarter of a century will go down in history as classics of the period. His fights against special privilege, his demand for a greater and more elastic currency, his opposition to the exorbitant prices charged for steel plate for battleships, his struggles against harmful monopolies—all these are matters of history and can not be overlooked by the future student of American history; but possibly the greatest service that it was his fortune to render the American people was in the upbuilding of the American Navy while he was a member of and chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, and the last official act of the distinguished Senator, the last signature that he ever placed to any document, was his signature to the conference report on the part of the Senate to the greatest naval bill that ever passed the American Congress. Under his chairmanship of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs the American Navy was so increased and builded up that it now stands second only to that of Great Britain, and that Navy, with the assistance of those of our allies, made it possible for America to send across the ocean more than 2,000,000 of American soldiers to join with the other legions of liberty in the great war of democracy and freedom of the world without the loss of a single American transport. Under his leadership great navy yards were built and improved in all parts of the country where needed, and the one on the coast of his own State will always be linked with his name and remain a monument to his memory.

He loved his fellow man, he loved freedom, he loved liberty; and when the civilization of mankind was at stake, when the freedom and liberty of the world were threatened, when oppressed people were crying out for assistance, when American rights were disregarded and invaded, when the American flag was insulted, he declared that these conditions were intolerable and that he would vote for a declaration of war against Germany whenever the opportunity presented, and he lived to see his country and yours take its proper place in the affairs of the world, but alas! the grim reaper carried him over yonder before it was given to him to see the glorious emblem of liberty and freedom floating over the victorious troops of free America on the fields of France.

He played his part like a man, he fought his battles like a soldier, he died in the service of his country, as he wished to do, and his State and his country are the better for that he lived. He is gone but not forgotten. The memory of his service and achievement will linger long after all of those who knew him, who loved him, and respected him, shall have joined that great invisible host in the eternal over yonder.

Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN, I move that the Senate stand in recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Monday, December 16, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, December 15, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. LEVER as Speaker pro tempore.

Rev. F. Ward Denys, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Father of all who have gone, to whom we come at this time in solemn consciousness that we ourselves must all sooner or later enter the realm of the everlasting, we invoke Thy divine guidance on this occasion, that this memorial may be a fitting expression of that which concerns the one who has gone into the realm which we all must enter, and that that which is said of him may become an imperishable evidence of the services that he, as a faithful servant of his Master and of his country, rendered in these Halls prior to his going to the halls of lasting glory. These and all things we ask in the name of Him who is the author and soul of all that is good and true and beautiful; amen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, the passing of Senator TILLMAN was an event which marked the closing of a remarkable career of a man in a remarkable period of the history of South Carolina and the history of the United States. I had known Senator TILLMAN since the beginning of his public career, and I desire to express what I have to say about him under three periods.

The first period of his public career was one of political agitation. Business conditions in South Carolina were at a very low ebb in 1885, when he opened his career as an agitator for the betterment of the agricultural conditions in the State. There was no agricultural educational facility worth the name in the State of South Carolina at that time. There was practically no agitation looking to the betterment of agricultural conditions and, although 10 years had elapsed since the people of the State had regained control of their affairs, there was probably less prosperity than there had been 5 or 10 years before.

At a meeting at Bennettsville, in the greatest farming county, from the cotton standpoint, in the cotton belt, in August, 1885, Mr. TILLMAN startled the State by an assault upon the dry rot, as he termed it, which was prevailing in South Carolina, and an assault upon what was considered to be the ark of the covenant, almost, upon which you did not dare to lay your hands. He brought about an agitation which was far-reaching, and whose effect has not yet ceased to be felt in South Carolina.

At that time Capt. TILLMAN as he then was—captain of the Edgefield Hussars—had never asked for or held public office. He disclaimed any desire to hold public office; but he contended that there should be an agricultural institution in South Carolina which should have nothing but agricultural and mechanical education as its object, and have the united support of the agricultural interests of South Carolina.

A good deal of confusion has arisen as to the establishment of the institution which grew up out of that agitation. Claims and counterclaims have been made as to who established it. As a matter of fact, the legislature of 1888, before Senator TILLMAN became a public servant in any capacity, accepted the bequest of Thomas G. Clemson, and provided for the establishment of Clemson College, and in 1889 they made provision for the construction of the building. So many have contended that it was not the work of Senator TILLMAN, because he did not come into power until December, 1890, when he became governor of the State; but they overlook the fact that the agitation which he set in motion brought about the will of Thomas G. Clemson, who left the John C. Calhoun estate to the State of South Carolina for the purpose of establishing Clemson College, and made Senator TILLMAN one of the life trustees in that will.

Therefore it can not be questioned that this agitation promoted the establishment of that institution, which was the apple of his eye as long as he lived, and which is one of the greatest agricultural institutions in the United States, and which has given untold benefits to the State of South Carolina. That is the fact as to the establishment of Clemson College. It was to TILLMAN, not as the Governor, not as the legislator, but to TILLMAN as the political agitator, to whom we owe Clemson College, without any question or possibility of cavil, for that agitation before he ever aspired to public office forced the acceptance of the bequest and the establishment of the institution.

Senator TILLMAN was not a man who was unknown to political life, although he had never aspired to it. When he began his agitation, it is instructive to look at the associates with whom he had grown up. The list of those who were in power in South Carolina, his fellows around the board when they met in social communion, were men of great distinction: United States Senator M. C. Butler, from Edgefield; Gov. John C. Shepherd, from Edgefield; Congressman George D. Tillman, his senior brother, from Edgefield; Commissioner of Agriculture Andrew Pickens Butler, from Edgefield; chairman of the Railroad Commission of South Carolina, Gen. Milledge L. Bonham, from Edgefield; solicitor of the judicial circuit in which he lived; Richard G. Bonham, from Edgefield; United States district attorney, Leroy F. Youmans, from Edgefield, first attorney general and then district attorney—these were the representatives of his county when he began the agitation and were his associates of a lifetime.

To be sure they indicate that certainly in Edgefield political prominence and power were not wanting, and they indicate the fiber of the man who, with his own brother serving in this Hall, instituted a crusade against the conditions that then existed that was destined to hurl from power every man I have named in this distinguished list and leave them as political wrecks upon the shores of time. And yet Senator TILLMAN made that beginning, and the beginning culminated in 1890 when, at the call of the Farmers' Alliance, organized to attempt to ameliorate the conditions of this country, which was then in the throes of a financial panic, he became candidate for governor and was triumphantly elected in 1890.

And that began the period of his career as governor. That career, Mr. Speaker, was one of very distinguished ability and very distinguished ideals. The first and the greatest of his constructive ideas was the establishment in South Carolina of an institution for the technical training of the girls of that State, which has grown now to be the jewel of all of our educational institutions. And yet the statement is frequently met that he was not the founder of Winthrop. That is true in one sense of the word. Winthrop College, for the training of the girls of the State, was founded as an institution in 1887. The annual appropriation for it was $5,200 a year, a paltry pittance beside the $150,000 that we were spending for education of the males of South Carolina.

When he came into the governership one of his first moves was to provide for the establishment of that institution on a firm basis, and in the legislature of 1891 provision was made for the obtaining of a site and suitable building and making proper appropriation, and it was carried through by the people of Rock Hill, one of the progressive communities of the State, giving the State $60,000 to establish the institution within their midst. And to-day they house within the walls of that college, I believe, 1,500 girls, and could house 1,500 more if suitable buildings could be erected; and we appropriate $130,000 every year merely for the support of the institution. Directly as the result of his far-seeing statesmanship toward the education of the youth of South Carolina, you will find 80 per cent of the teachers in the public schools of that State who are the direct product of that great institution. And you go into the homes of South Carolina, all over the State, and you see them shaped by the splendid education that has been received in that college. I say that is the crowning work of his life as governor.

He did several other things. The next was the solving of the suffrage question. We were confronted with a majority, on the popular vote of South Carolina, of 40,000 colored people—40,000 colored votes if they all voted. It had been by the most strenuous and sometimes the most questionable methods that we had maintained white civilization and the control of the white people after we had once regained control, which it took a revolution to do. Senator TILLMAN by his influence as governor brought about the holding of a constitutional convention which settled the suffrage question, in my judgment, forever for South Carolina, because the census now shows that the increase in the white race has so greatly exceeded the increase in the colored race that the voting strength is now equal if all are registered and all capable of registering. But it was his statesmanship that forced the calling of a convention which put an educational and a property qualification upon the one who desired to vote, and the provision was made absolutely equal to all. All a man had to do was either to be able to write and to read the Constitution or have $300 worth of property on the tax books subject to taxation, and he could register and vote.

I have heard a good deal said sometimes in this hall about the discrimination against the southern colored man as to voting. There is no discrimination and never has been in South Carolina since the adoption of this constitution. That was the handiwork of Senator TILLMAN; and next to the establishment of Winthrop, I consider that the greatest work he ever accomplished in State affairs.

He did another thing which shows the remarkable boldness of the man, when he put the State of South Carolina into a monopoly of the liquor business, which most people concede now was a mistake and which after 14 years passed away. And those were the three great highwater marks of achievement in his career as governor.

As a United States Senator he came to office at a time when the people of this country were crying out for an increased circulating medium, when our circulating medium was $27 a head. And when we reflect that to-day it is $56 a head, we can see what an enormous advance has been made. And he arraigned himself on the side of those who were in favor of a great increase and great elasticity in the currency of this country, which has been justified by the enactment of legislation in the last few years which has relieved the stringency and inelasticity of finance of this country to such an extent that Senator TILLMAN has been justified in every position he took on the financial question.

He also came here at a time when we were practically without a navy and when the construction of a navy was tied up by the extortion of the Steel Trust. He won the title of "Pitchfork Statesman" in his assault upon the people who furnished the armor plate for the construction of our Navy, a title that has gone with him to his grave as a title of honor and one of which he was more proud than of any other title he ever received.

And his history here as United States Senator was bound up with the history of the development of the Navy and the development of the interests in building up the Navy until it was crowned by the establishment of an armor-plate factory, for which he contended 15 years before it came, and the administration and the efficiency of a Navy which has been a thing of pride and a comfort during the late war through which we have passed and we have all had to acknowledge the efficiency, the power, the modesty, and the high-toned conditions of this branch of the service.

As a literary man the Senator was unequaled and unsurpassed in the use of the English language, in logic that went to the heart of every matter, and his most conspicuous effort, in my judgment, in that line was the correspondence conducted with Mr. Henry Watterson, of Louisville, Ky., and Mr. George Harvey, of New York, a few years ago when they combined in an assault upon the then Gov. Wilson, of New Jersey, who was being talked of as a candidate for the Presidency, and a perusal of the correspondence between Senator TILLMAN and them will show how he unhorsed the two past masters in the use of English, and swept away the cobwebs of injustice which they were hanging about the neck of Mr. Wilson; and this helped materially to promote Mr. Wilson's nomination and election to the Presidency.

Now, I want to say just one word as to Senator TILLMAN's private life. For 33 years he and I were personal friends. We frequently divided politically, but the personal relations between us have always been the most cordial; and I consider the strong point which made him unassailable in almost every walk of life was the beautiful character of his family life, which caused him to lean upon and trust and take counsel of his helpmeet, his wife, who stood around him like a protecting wall through all these years; the family life of that man was a benediction, and such a signpost as to point every man to the way of high living in social circles, such that no finger of scorn and no tongue of scandal assail.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, we are met to pay tribute to the memory of one of South Carolina's great men, in order that the record of this Congress may contain some comment upon the career of one of her great statesmen. It is unnecessary that tributes should be paid in order that his State or the Nation might be impressed with the great value of his services, or with the nobleness of his character, because his service in the Nation's Congress speaks for itself. It was not my privilege to have known Senator TILLMAN intimately, but I recall as a young man, when following speeches and the career of men in the United States Senate, the impression that was made when he first came to the Capital of the Republic. I remember how he came before the attention of the citizens of the Nation and left his mark as a fearless statesman. He impressed me as one who despised all sham, and he was not afraid to speak plainly upon any issue or upon any question. He went to the meat of any subject which he undertook to discuss, and he argued and debated with a strength that impressed one as a man discussing a question with his whole soul.

I happened to be designated upon the committee that went upon that sad journey when the remains of Senator TILLMAN were consigned to their last resting place. No one who was present upon that occasion but would be impressed with the sense of loss that was apparent amid the surrounding throng who came to attend the funeral exercises. As I before stated, he was one of South Carolina's great statesmen. He left behind him a name which will be remembered and revered in the days to come. That State has given many great men to the Nation's service—Calhoun, Hampton, Butler—but in these days those who have been privileged to serve with BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN I am sure will be of the opinion that his name and his career are fit to be placed upon the same high pedestal to which we look when we think of those men who went before him.

I am reminded that Senator TILLMAN at one time delivered an address in which he compared and linked up, so to speak, the great history of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which I have the honor in part to represent, and that of the State of South Carolina. It is significant, Mr. Speaker, that to-day in the other branch of this Congress, the senior Senator from my State is among those who are paying tribute to the memory and career of Senator TILLMAN. I refer to the senior Senator from Massachusetts, HENRY CABOT LODGE, who I believe was designated by Senator TILLMAN, either just before his death or sometime ago, to speak upon his career when he should have gone.

Senator TILLMAN, although he brought great fame to the State of South Carolina, will stand forth not only as one of that State's great men, but as one of the Nation's statesmen, one who was intimately connected with many of the great problems with which we have had to contend in these later years. I was interested in hearing of his early activities in the State of South Carolina, and how with that remarkable courage, that indomitable will, he forced himself and the issues which he stood for to the front and gained a place among the councils of his State. We pay this tribute with respect and reverence, with the assurance that his memory will ever be kept green, and that his career will be looked upon as a worthy example to those who aspire to represent others either in the State or the Nation.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Speaker, BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN sat in the seat of the immortal Calhoun in the United States Senate for nearly 24 years—a longer time than anyone else has served as a Senator from South Carolina. At the time of his entry into South Carolina politics I was only a boy, but the events that followed and the leading part he played for more than a quarter of a century have left some vivid recollections. South Carolina, among all of the States, has been noted for having more politics for its size than any other State in the Union, and from the beginning of her history many of its campaigns have attracted Nation-wide interest. She has furnished her quota of public men and statesmen, who have not only left their impress upon the history of the State but upon the history of the Nation, and among those public men and statesmen TILLMAN's name will have to be written.

I will not attempt in this sketch to review South Carolina politics and affairs. The conditions immediately following the Civil War and the corruption of a régime from 1868 up until 1876, when the white people determined to regain control of their governmental affairs, are well known. However, after the political revolution of 1876, resulting in the redemption of the State, there developed an idea among the people that the masses did not have a proper voice in the government, and there was much complaint of government of "aristocracy," "Bourbons," and "ring rule," and in some quarters it was charged that the governor and State officers were named and chosen at the annual dinner of a prominent social club in South Carolina. This naturally resulted in a great deal of unrest among the masses of the people and they were beginning to be prepared for the political revolution that occurred in 1890.

Living in the county of Edgefield, near the banks of the Savannah River, was a farmer, unheard of and unknown, but whose family had written their names upon the brightest pages of the history of the State. This farmer was BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN. His brother, Jim Tillman, as Bishop Capers declared at a great rally in the city of Columbia, was the "Oriflame of his regiment" in the war of the Confederacy, and the name of Tillman can be found upon the rolls of those who fought in all of the wars of this country—the War of the Revolution, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, in which one of his nephews was a colonel, and afterwards lieutenant governor of his State, and the great World War—one of his sons being now in France, having gone there as captain of his company, and now being in charge as major of his battalion. George D. Tillman for 16 years sat as a Member of this body, and was recognized throughout the Nation as one of its greatest statesmen. BEN TILLMAN, this farmer, taking his cue from the Ellenton riot, from the dark days of '76, and that matchless and gallant leader, Mart Gary, who was known as "The Bald Eagle of Edgefield," picked up the threads of the movement where they were left by him. He knew the conditions of the masses of the people; he came forward and went on the rostrum. At that time it is stated that he was ridiculed and laughed at on account of his poor showing on the stump, notwithstanding the fact that he afterwards developed into one of the greatest stump speakers South Carolina has ever produced. He knew, though, that behind him there was a vast multitude of people who were demanding justice and who were looking to him as their leader. He appeared in the State convention of 1888, and went down in defeat as a leader of the minority in that convention.

He went back to his home; continued his agitation, and in the historic March convention of 1890, he was nominated for governor of South Carolina. The campaign that followed is memorable in the history of our State, and no true record can be written of it that does not record its causes and great effects. Mr. TILLMAN was elected governor by an overwhelming vote of the white people. After a stormy administration of two years he became a candidate for reelection as governor and was opposed by a distinguished fellow citizen of his own county and ex-governor of the State. In that campaign, South Carolina was again aroused from the mountains to the seaboard, and partisanship and passion ran high, but again a majority of the voters said that he should be their governor. Two years more of his administration was marked by storm and discord, but it gave to the masses that which they sought—freedom of thought and political liberty, which God intended they should have. His terms as governor of South Carolina were signalized by the establishment of the Clemson Agricultural and Mechanical College for boys, at Calhoun's old home, Fort Hill—an agitation which was begun by him in 1886, for industrial and technical education in South Carolina—and this, with the establishment of Winthrop College for girls, stands forth to-day as the greatest educational achievement in the history of the State.

His administration was also signalized by the establishment of the State dispensary system for the control of the liquor traffic, which many people believed then, and believe to-day, that under proper management, is the best solution of the liquor problem. This system was established in the face of an overwhelming vote in favor of prohibition at the election in 1892, and was the cause of much discord in the political, social, and personal affairs of the people of South Carolina. The enforcement of this law, during the latter part of his last administration as governor, gave him an opportunity to show his ability as a bold and daring fighter, which characterized him throughout his political career. In March, 1894, in a clash between some of the constables appointed by him for the enforcement of this law, and some citizens at Darlington, who thought that their rights had been invaded, some were killed and many others wounded, and the riot which ensued came near resulting in serious trouble throughout the State. However, Gov. TILLMAN took charge of the situation, ordered out the entire militia of the State, took charge of the telegraph lines and railroads, and very soon restored order, and there was no further trouble.

When he had served two terms as governor, he was overwhelmingly elected to the United States Senate—having made a county to county canvass throughout the State for that office.

Senator TILLMAN was a striking figure, and he is missed by the people of his State and in the councils of the Nation. He will go down in the history of South Carolina and of this Nation as one of the strongest men who has served South Carolina as governor or represented her in the United States Senate. Of his services as a Senator they can and will be spoken of better by those who served with him there for the past quarter of a century, but on this occasion I can not refrain from quoting the closing paragraphs of an editorial written by John K. Aull, in the Charleston American, upon the death of Senator TILLMAN:

Undoubtedly, while he went to Washington under most unwelcome conditions, being openly hostile to what he believed to be the wicked Cleveland régime, his genius soon allayed the errors and suspicions of his confrères and he became a shining light. Space does not permit us to sketch even briefly the many commanding positions he assumed in legislation, nor is this the place. We have watched him there upon the Senate floor matching his genius with giants of the old days and coming off never second best. His name will long live to heighten the fame of Carolina in a body whose traditions number among them the glory of Calhoun.

Even had his health not failed him, it is gravely doubtful if in recent or future years he could mingle with the same zest amongst the almost entirely new faces in the Senate. His old colleagues were gone. They were to him merely spirits that cast perhaps across his daily path through the Senate aisle shadows of bygone days, days when the polished Senator Hoar, who learned so warmly to love him, referred, not banteringly, but earnestly to him as "the best lawyer in the Senate." Hoar, Vest, Bacon, Allison, Daniels, Hale, Cockrell, Aldrich, and many like them, who left him one by one for awhile are with him now—for although many of these differed with him and often with one another, they were all one in pure Americanism, loving and serving the land they honored with an untarnished patriotism.

So let us leave him with them. The light of heaven shines upon those mooted questions over which they opposed only the feeble light of even their great intellects. There will be no "adjournments" there, no "points of order," no "filibuster," no tariffs, subsidies, or silver question to wrangle over, but all sweet peace, truth, harmony, and happiness forever.

What more appropriate may we say than that he deserves the lines written upon the death of Napoleon:

"The lightnings may flash and the loud thunders rattle;
He heeds not, he hears not; he's free from all pain;
He sleeps his last sleep, he has fought his last battle;
No sound can awake him to glory again!"

In his native soil, in the little village of Trenton, there now rests in peace one who forged his way to a high place among the truly great of this Nation, and Taller he seems in death.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I can add nothing, or but little at best, to the eloquent tributes that have already been spoken concerning the life work of a splendid character who figured prominently for more than a quarter of a century in the national affairs of our Government. I, however, was associated largely with him, he being chairman of the Committee of Naval Affairs of the Senate, and I of the Committee of Naval Affairs of the House. This afforded an opportunity for official and personal association.

I desire, first of all, to bear testimony to the cordial good friendship which existed between us. Senator TILLMAN was a unique character. He was built in a mold strictly his own. He was unique in many respects, and the very uniqueness of his character not only attracted attention but challenged admiration. He was a man of strong personality. His personality was positive and decidedly his own. We can not find, I think, in private or public life a duplicate of Senator TILLMAN. He possesssed traits of personal character that not only attracted, not only challenged our esteem, but gained for him admiration, and brought him forward prominently in the affairs of the Government.

He was a man of strong convictions. There was nothing, if I may use a homely expression, of milk and cider in his composition. He was a man who believed sincerely and strongly whatever he believed, and he had the courage to express his convictions. He was a man of persistent purpose. Once he was convinced of the righteousness of his cause, once he was satisfied of the desirability of his course of conduct, once that it came to him as a conviction of duty, there was no let up. Continually, persistently he strove for that which his judgment and his conscience approved. As we stand under these circumstances, and would give expression not in mere formal words, but in the sincere convictions which we entertain of the man, all of us must admire this persistency of purpose, this strength of conviction, this strong personality.

He was a man of strong likes and dislikes. A man who has a strong personality, who has a persistent purpose, who has strong convictions of right and of wrong, a man who draws the line tautly between right and wrong in personal life, in private affairs, in public affairs, in the duties and responsibilities of government, could not be otherwise in the natural order of things than a man of strong likes and dislikes. He drew his friends to him with a strong grasp, and those in whom he did not have confidence—those whose integrity of purpose or of character he doubted—he repelled, because there was a congeniality between Senator TILLMAN and the truth, and there was an aspersion between him and guile and wrong. Hence it is that when we speak of him as a man of strong likes, a man in whom flowed strongly and vigorously the milk of human kindness for those who shared his esteem, we must at the same time admire that corollary attribute of character that he despised hypocrisy and made it manifest on all occasions.

He broke away from the established custom of conservatism. That was natural, and that was one of the prominent outstanding traits of his character, and one of the strong, predominant features of his life and his services.

Most of us run along in the way of least resistance. We go along the line of established organization, of established conservatism. It was not so with Senator TILLMAN. He had some convictions about the existing orders of things. Some things were going along which did not receive the sanction of his judgment or the approval of his conscience, and he broke away completely and strongly from the organized conservatism of the day and started out on lines of his own thought and of his own judgment and approval.

I would not seek to compare him in all respects, but the suggestion occurs to me that in the olden days John the Baptist broke away from the established conservatism in religious affairs. John Knox broke away from the established organization. Martin Luther battled the conservatism which he believed was not only promulgating but establishing error and wrong. And in political matters in his State, and to some extent in the Nation, Senator TILLMAN broke away from this organized conservatism, and he challenged the thought and attention, and he brought the thought and attention of the people of his own State and of the Nation to think along other and different lines.

Senator TILLMAN was honest. He became known here and was often spoken of as "honest BEN TILLMAN." However much anyone differed with him, however much they might separate themselves from his conclusions, however much they might challenge his doctrines of political economy, no one ever doubted or really challenged his personal honesty and integrity of character or his political honesty and sincerity of purpose.

Again, Mr. Speaker, he was faithful to the trust that was reposed in him. No one has ever called him a derelict in politics. No one has ever spoken of him as in any way betraying the trust and the confidence which the people, not only of his State but of the Union, reposed in him, as an honest man and a public servant. So that to-day, under these surroundings, we can speak of him as an honest man and a faithful public servant.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, coming here as he did under peculiar and unique surroundings, occupying at the first a strange and unique attitude that called forth many criticisms and comments in the papers, causing individuals and the press to speak in terms that were out of the ordinary routine of political literature, he grew in the esteem and in the affection of his associates and of the country.

During the past summer the end came somewhat suddenly. I was selected as one of the committee to go to his home in South Carolina to lay away his body for the resurrection. It was only his body that we laid in the ground, not BEN TILLMAN. His spirit had risen into that higher, nobler, grander, larger, better life where the aspirations of his soul in all the years of his life—and a large, rich life it had been—had said, "It is not death, but life I crave; a larger, better, richer, fuller life I would have."

He realized it, and he has gone to the reward of the just. Wherever the honest, wherever the faithful are, Senator TILLMAN is there, and he has left here with us the name, the reputation, the character of an honest and faithful man.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. NICHOLLS.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed hard for me to add anything to the wonderful tributes and the just tributes that have been paid here to our deceased colleague, Senator TILLMAN. I come from the people and from the section of the country that, when TILLMAN started, were bitterly opposed to him. From the time I was a child I had been taught that Senator TILLMAN was representing what was not best for the State, although the people with whom I most associated did not for one minute question his honor or his integrity. On one occasion when I was a mere boy I was talking to the overseer on a large plantation in my home county. He was, as we knew the word, a strong Tillmanite. The man who owned that plantation was as bitter against Senator TILLMAN as any man in South Carolina. The overseer and the man who owned the plantation had been boys together before the Civil War. In fact, the overseer's father had been the overseer of the owner's father before the Civil War.

I asked him, purely from curiosity, "How in the world can you support TILLMAN?" He said: "Sam, So-and-So told me the other day that we needed a reform in South Carolina; that ring rule had long existed; and that while he was a party in a way to the ring rule, something ought to be done, and that something ought to be started to give the honest, common people a chance to have a voice in this Government. I said"—that is, this man said—"'That is exactly what TILLMAN is trying to do.' He said: "It should be done, but I don't think TILLMAN is the man." And this overseer said to me, "It did not occur to me that it made any particular difference who the man was, what we wanted was a reform, and we could change the man if we found he was not the right one." To-day, Mr. Speaker, the man who made that remark about not believing that Senator TILLMAN was the right man is his friend and was his friend at the time of his death.

As one of my colleagues has stated, and I truly believe, there is no State in the Union where politics is so bitter and so partisan as in my own State of South Carolina. I am not referring to the two great parties, but to factional politics within the party. One reason that I give for this is because in our State all candidates for office go upon the same stump and have joint debates which at times get very personal. Their followers naturally take sides, and I have seen the time in South Carolina—and my other colleagues from there have seen the same thing—when a man almost took his life in his hand to go upon the stump there on either side.

When I was a boy I once asked why Senator TILLMAN was not afraid of having more fights, as I expressed it, and a gentleman from our home town said, "Well, I will tell you, Sam, why he is not afraid. It is because most of the fighting men are on his side of the proposition." That was largely true, for the people of South Carolina thought that they had been mistreated by certain politicians, and the people of South Carolina who supported Senator TILLMAN were willing to fight for those rights of which they thought they had been deprived, and they got behind him and elected him governor. What a howl went up through this country.

Almost every newspaper, not only of South Carolina but throughout the United States, called him a demagogue, called him everything that they could well call him and not be indicted for libel. What did he do? He "stuck to his guns," if you will pardon a crude expression. He worked for the interests he had promised to serve. He was not afraid. No man in the State could run him from the stump. He went before his people, and he advocated their cause. He was reelected governor in spite of strong opposition from strong men. The money powers of his State, while, of course, I do not charge them with being corrupt, were against him. The newspapers of the State were largely against him, but the masses of the toiling people of South Carolina stood behind him. He was reelected governor, as I said, and afterwards was elected to the United States Senate. Why, Mr. Speaker, I remember, although at that time I was too young to have any voice in politics, that there was strong talk in South Carolina that the Senate would not seat him when he came. But he was seated; and, Mr. Speaker, in his early days here, with that strong tongue that he had, he caused some men who had mocked and laughed at him to be very strong for him before he got through. He turned out to be not what the papers said he was, a radical and an obstructionist. I will not say at the time of his death that he was what South Carolina would have called a conservative. Senator TILLMAN could not be conservative. As my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has stated, when he believed a thing there could be no conservatism. He worked to the end that he thought was right.

When I came to Washington, if you will pardon me for referring to myself, and I do it for the reason that I did not know him well when I came here, I went to his office the first day and said, "Senator, I came in to pay my respects."

He knew pretty well the attitude of every man in South Carolina as to himself. If you mentioned a man from Barnwell, Spartanburg, Columbia, Oconee, if he was a man of any political prominence, Senator TILLMAN could tell you how he stood with him in his politics. I said, "Senator, I came in to pay my respects." He said, "Sam, I am glad to see you here, but I have not a particle of use for your politics." That was his blunt way of speaking. It made me angry, and I said, "Senator, I have got no more for yours than you have for mine." He said, "I will make a trade with you. If you will let me alone over there I will let you alone over here." I said, "You have traded." And I walked out of his office. The next day the phone rang, and the Senator said, "Sam, can you come to my office?" I went over, and he said, "I did not mean anything yesterday. We have differed in politics, but I want us to get along together. You are a new man, a young man, and I possibly can give you advice and information that you will need." I shook hands with the Senator, and from that day to the day of his death he was like a father to me. There was no time when I needed advice that I did not go to Senator TILLMAN, knowing that I would get good and honest advice.

To show you the character of the Senator, the night before the last campaign opened I went to him and asked him to do a favor for a friend of mine. It turned out that we were both very much criticized by some of the newspapers because we granted the favor, a favor which was nothing more than was just and right. The Senator at that time thought that he would be in the race for the Senate again. I went to Senator TILLMAN and I said, "Senator, I know that you made this recommendation because I asked you to do it, because you believed I would not mislead you. Feeling as I do about it, I believe it my duty to come out in the papers and state that I will take the whole responsibility for that action in case it hurts you in your race." He said, "I will not let you do it. I will never put the responsibility for what I do on any man. It is true your recommendation had something to do with my signing it, but I have signed it and I am behind it."

That shows you, Mr. Speaker, the manner of man that Senator TILLMAN was. I am sorry I have been unable, on account of being away from the city, to write what I consider a fitting eulogy of this great man. Our State, as has been well said, has produced great men, but no man in the history of South Carolina has ever been in a position to make bigger history, to make more lasting history than Senator TILLMAN. We all remember at the time when the Democratic Party took charge of the Senate there was some talk throughout the country that Senator TILLMAN wanted to be chairman of another committee than Naval Affairs. He was made chairman of Naval Affairs, and, Mr. Speaker, I would rather be chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee or of the Military Affairs Committee, if I cared to go down in history and properly serve my country in the time of this great world war, than to be chairman of any committee in either branch of Congress.

He was not stingy; he was not extravagant. He believed that what was necessary in this war should be given and freely given. And he gave to the service of his country one of the noblest boys whom I know. He was my personal friend. I say he gave him to his country, but fortunately he has not been killed. He is in France now. He is a "chip off the old block," and I am proud to say that, although this country has sustained the loss of our great statesman, he leaves one or more behind him who some day may be able to in part fill his place.

The last time I talked with Senator TILLMAN was the day before his last stroke of paralysis. He was discussing every phase of the war and seemed to think that his days were numbered. He told me that he hoped, regardless of politics in South Carolina, he would live long enough to see America and her allies victorious in this war. If he had lived that long, I believe his every ambition would have been fulfilled. My great regret is that God in His infinite wisdom did not see fit to allow him to live to see the plans which he had so carefully prepared carried out to a successful conclusion.

He died as he had lived, "with his boots on," fighting for the people, for democracy, and for everything that he thought right and just for the upbuilding of humanity.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that he request that unanimous consent be given to all those who may desire to extend their remarks.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. I make that request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. WHALEY.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Speaker, believing that others who will speak on this occasion will give a biographical sketch of South Carolina's illustrious son in whose honor we have met, I shall avoid the probability of repetition and undertake a brief analysis of those characteristics of the late Senator BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN which made him so valuable a citizen and Governor of the State of South Carolina and such an effective Member of the United States Senate.

TILLMAN was born on a farm, reared on a farm, and, after the attainment of the years of manhood, followed agriculture as an occupation. It is said that his agricultural experience was not particularly successful and in this respect he had much in common with the agricultural producers of his time, not only in South Carolina but throughout the United States. During his years of ill-rewarded efforts upon the farm his observation, his difficulties, and his disappointments impressed indelibly upon his mind the severe disadvantages and the great discouragements which all too frequently surround the agricultural producer. It was through an endeavor to alleviate the condition of the farming class that TILLMAN entered public life and gave his attention primarily to the solution of the great problems which must be solved before American agriculture can be placed upon a firm and satisfactory foundation.

From his youth he had grappled with the most practical of problems in a most practical way. He learned in the hard school of adversity. His principles of economics were not gleaned from books. Although he was in later life one of the best-read men in the best of literature, the mental training which enabled him to achieve success was acquired chiefly as an incident and result of his daily observation of the circumstances under which the producing classes labor and the evils with which they must contend.

He beheld ignorance among people who are conducting an industry which requires the widest training and skill.

He observed injustice which deprived the agricultural worker of the due reward of his labor. Contemplation of these evils and injustices not only developed in him a power to reason, but nourished deep-seeded emotions which became predominating features of his political activities and public addresses. No amount of abstract economic reasoning would have produced the political revolution which he led prior to his election to the governorship of South Carolina. In the words of an illustrious President of the United States, the farmers of South Carolina were "confronted by conditions, and not theories." No ordinary methods would have aroused them to united effort sufficiently organized and sufficiently aggressive to overthrow those who were at that time dominant in the public affairs of his State.

It has been asserted and is quite likely true that TILLMAN frequently indulged in extravagances of statement which more deliberate and careful men would have avoided. No one, however, has ever accused him of overstating a fact for an ulterior or selfish purpose. Dealing with conditions which required heroic remedies, he made his attacks with what might be considered a reckless abandon, upon the assumption that the end justified the means. He was seeking results, and his overwhelming victory in the face of tremendous opposition seems to have justified the measures he adopted. That a farmer should be elected and reelected Governor of South Carolina at that time in the political history of the State was an accomplishment which could not have been achieved by the ordinary weapons of political conflict.

TILLMAN's mind was that of a nonconformist. He acknowledged the binding force of no political conventionalities. Before he had been one month in the United States Senate he had broken the rule which requires silence on the part of a new Member, and had made a speech which earned him the sobriquet of "Pitchfork TILLMAN." From that day to the time of his retirement from active participation in the work of the Senate he was recognized as a factor to be considered in almost every important piece of legislation. He was not one who delighted to participate in discussion merely for the purpose of showing his skill in debate, but, whenever any subject appealed to him as calling for action on his part, he threw the whole power of his keen intellect, his marvelous skill at repartee, and his unsurpassed command of vitriolic language into the discussion.

He asked no quarter and he gave none. Naturally this style of fighting made him few warm personal friends but aroused many enmities. It is well known and universally acknowledged fact, however, that none of the animosities thus aroused cost him either the confidence or the respect of his associates. His honesty of purpose was not brought in dispute. Knowing the purity of his motives, even those who felt the sting of his arrows admired his skill, and held him personally in the highest esteem. His diatribes furnished frequent occasion for jest, but they supplied little humor to those who were the objects of his invective.

Unlike most men who enter upon crusades against economic evils, TILLMAN was not destructive. He founded the Clemson College for the training of the young men in agriculture and the applied sciences. He established the Winthrop Normal and Industrial School for women. He secured the enactment of more just and equitable laws for the assessment of taxes. He secured the election of railroad commissioners by the people, with authority vested in them to fix passenger and freight rates. He secured the enactment of the primary system of party nominations. He was the author of the dispensary law which eliminated the public barroom from South Carolina and led the way for prohibition. These were a few of the more important accomplishments of four years in the governorship, during which time he had as strong an opposition as ever a governor faced.

Entering the United States Senate in 1895 he was for 23 consecutive years a member of that body. Although the Republicans were in control of the Senate when the railroad rate bill was under consideration in 1906, a split among the Republicans threw the management of that measure upon Senator TILLMAN—a task which he performed with much credit to himself and to his party. He was an advocate of a large navy and made his influence felt. In the framing of a multitude of important measures he participated actively, always fearlessly and aggressively representing what he believed to be the best interests of the people of the United States and of his own State.

To the youth of America the career of BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN should be of interest. It will be worth while for them to remember that it was through no favor of good fortune or prestige of family that he attained his high position in the councils of our Government. Neither was it personal ambition that led him into public life. He saw the need of public reforms, and although the task was great and the prospect of success doubtful, he undertook it without hesitation and devoted himself without reserve to the amelioration of the condition of his fellow citizens. He had few of the advantages of school education but neglected no opportunity for the improvement of his mind. He had confidence in himself and accepted his own judgment as his guide, even though he diverged from the course and methods laid down by American political leaders during a century of our national history.

His career emphasizes the value of practical experience in early youth, courage to undertake a difficult task, and willingness to be a nonconformist when sound judgment and high motives indicate that as the proper course. It would be difficult to find in American political history another instance of a man whose public career shows advancement direct from the farm to the governorship and thence to the United States Senate solely as the result of individual merit and ability.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN, the man whom we to-day honor, was born in Edgefield County, South Carolina, August 11, 1847. He was a son of Benjamin Ryan Tillman and Sophia Hancock, and was the youngest of eleven children. When he was but two years of age his father died, and he was reared by his mother on the plantation about twelve miles from the town of Edgefield. He studied at home under private tutors until he was fourteen years of age, when he attended a school conducted by Mr. George Golphin, a scholarly man who enjoyed the distinction of having served as tutor to Senator Butler, Gen. Mart Gary, and many others prominent in the political life of South Carolina. In July, 1864, when not quite seventeen years of age, he left school and volunteered in the service of the Confederate Army, but while on his way to join the army he was taken sick, and it was during this illness that he lost his left eye by reason of the formation of an abscess. For two years he was an invalid. Upon his recovery he went to Florida where he spent a year, returning in 1868 to Edgefield County, where he engaged in farming. While thus engaged Senator Tillman devoted his leisure time to study, in his own language, "reading everything of value he could lay his hands upon." He had the most retentive memory of any man I ever knew, and it enabled him in recent years to quote from the poets, verses he had not read for years. Even in speeches delivered by him in early life this familiarity with the old masters was evident, and was a constant source of surprise to those who knew that he had not enjoyed the privilege of a college or university course.

When, in 1876, the white people of South Carolina determined to overthrow the rule of the carpetbagger, the scalawag, and the negro, Tillman participated with all the force and aggressiveness that has characterized every effort of his life. He organized the Red Shirts in that community. Under Capt. A. P. Butler he participated in what is known as the Hamburg riot, and on that occasion demonstrated his physical courage and his capacity for leadership. With the Edgefield Hussars he started to the Ellenton riot, but his company did not reach there in time to participate in the fight.

With the redemption of the State from negro rule, Tillman resumed his quiet life upon the farm, and from this seclusion did not emerge until 1885 when he went to Bennettsville, S. C., as a delegate to the annual meeting of the South Carolina Agricultural Society. Tillman had never delivered a public address, but upon reaching Bennettsville he announced that he was going to address the convention and would have something out of the ordinary to say to the delegates. He did not disappoint them. He pictured the poverty of the farmers, three-fourths of whom were borrowing money upon their crops before they were made, and with fiery eloquence he denounced the State officials for their indifference to the agricultural interests of the State. He urged the farmers to demand the establishment of an agricultural school worthy of the name, in connection with the South Carolina College, and to require the board of agriculture to annually hold farmers' institutes in the various counties of the State. He spoke for an hour, and when he concluded, though neither he nor his hearers realized it, he had started a revolution in the State of South Carolina.

From that day, August 5, 1885, to the day of his death, July 3, 1918, TILLMAN occupied the center of the political stage in South Carolina, and the story of his public life is the story of the political life of the State. To appreciate the impression made by his Bennettsville speech, one has to understand the political conditions then existing. Prior to the Civil War the State of South Carolina was ruled by a small group of men of great intelligence and of high character, most of whom resided in Charleston and Columbia. The State officials were generally selected by this group from among the professional men of the State. The one-horse farmer and the man without social standing never dreamed of his having the right to hold office and he even entertained some doubt as to his right to vote. Certainly had one of them announced his candidacy for office, he would have been in imminent danger of sequestration in an asylum for the insane. At the conclusion of the war the old leaders, their heirs and assigns, immediately resumed their control of the Democratic party; but as there was a majority of 30,000 negroes of voting age, the Republican party, composed of the negroes, the carpetbaggers, and the scalawags, were able to control the elections and did run the State government until 1876, when negro rule was overthrown and white supremacy established for all time.

Immediately following 1876 there was a natural disposition on the part of the rank and file of the people to blindly follow the leadership of the men who had controlled the party in the fight for the redemption of the State. Again there was the realization that any division within the party would endanger the freedom so dearly purchased. Consequently any criticism of the conduct of the State government was met with the warning that such a course would cause a division in the party and make possible a recurrence of Negro rule with all of its horrors and outrages. It is manifest that this condition of affairs made it easy for the old leaders to perpetuate their control of the government. Conditions were such that corruption in the government could have existed without the knowledge of the people. But to the everlasting credit of those in control it must be said that, nothwithstanding their autocratic power and the unlimited opportunity for misuse of that power, careful and even hostile investigation in after years failed to disclose evidence of corruption on the part of a single State official. The honesty of those in control was testified to by Senator TILLMAN in an address delivered in the Senate in 1898, when he described the conditions then existing in the following language:

> The State was democratic or independent in national politics, but it was aristocratic in local affairs. This aristocracy, be it said to its credit, gave to the State as good government, so far as purity and honesty is concerned, as any country ever had. But a prouder, more arrogant or hot-headed ruling class never existed.

With this statement of the political conditions one can appreciate the sensation caused by the speech of TILLMAN at Bennettsville in August, 1885. It brought down upon his head the wrath of the press as well as of the political leaders. "Farmer Ben" became the target for their satire and abuse. In a series of letters he defended his course and urged upon the farmers of the State his suggestion to establish an agricultural college. He cited the agricultural colleges of Mississippi and of Michigan as proof of the practicability and the wisdom of his suggestion, and published a lot of data secured from Stephen D. Lee, then President of the Mississippi College. His letters enlisted the support of many of the leading farmers of the State, who in the spring of 1886 held a convention at which resolutions indorsing his views were adopted. As the desired object could be accomplished only by legislation it was inevitable that the "Farmers' Alliance," as it was called, should take an interest in the elections. The old leaders, however, still firmly held the reins and the movement had not attained sufficient momentum to wrest control from them.

TILLMAN continued his agitation, delivering addresses in various counties of the State during the year 1887. In the political campaign of 1888 the farmers endeavored to induce several of the old political leaders to lead their fight, but their efforts were in vain. Two years later, in the spring of 1890, what was known as the "Shell Manifesto" was issued, a document that became the platform of the reform movement. A convention followed and TILLMAN was selected as the nominee for governor. Attorney General Earle and Gen. Bratton were later selected as the nominees of the faction that became known as the Conservatives. Of the seven hundred lawyers of the State only forty were known to be supporters of TILLMAN. The press was unanimously opposed to him, but a joint debate was held in every county of the State and as nearly every man, woman, and child in the State turned out to hear the speakers, TILLMAN was able to present his cause to the people. The feeling between the factions became so great that at many meetings the speakers were unable to make themselves heard, the factions engaging in a contest to see which could cheer their champion the loudest and the longest. After the first few meetings there was never any doubt about the result, and TILLMAN was nominated, carrying all but four counties of the State.

Dissatisfied with the result, the opposition placed an independent ticket in the field in the general election, but many of the Conservative leaders of the opposition failed to support the independent movement, and the followers of TILLMAN were even more determined, the result being the overwhelming election of Capt. TILLMAN.

In this campaign TILLMAN demonstrated his wonderful ability as a stump speaker. Picturesque figure that he was, with his Napoleonic features, shaded by his broad-rimmed hat, he never failed to attract the attention of the people. In this campaign he spoke to the people in a language they understood, of their right to participate in the government of the State, and not merely to register the will of others. In passionate language he denounced the editor of the News Courier, Capt. F. W. Dawson, the brilliant leader of the opposition, and as he inveighed against ring rule he aroused his supporters to such a fever of excitement that many of them were willing to fight for him, and, if need be, to die for him. His wonderful success as a public speaker is the more remarkable in view of the fact that he was thirty-six years old when he delivered his first public address at Bennettsville, and had he entered public life as early as do most men it is interesting to speculate upon the degree of perfection he might have attained. As it was, I do not believe, he had an equal.

During TILLMAN's first term as governor he was unable to accomplish many of the reforms he advocated because of the lack of cooperation on the part of the legislature, a majority of whom were his supporters. In 1892 he asked for reelection and in the campaign that followed designated many of the legislators as mere "driftwood" and urged the people to elect a legislature that would support him.

For reelection he was opposed by one of the ablest men in the State, ex-Governor John C. Sheppard. As in the previous campaign, factional feeling ran high, there being as clear a division between the Tillmanites and anti-Tillmanites as there is between Democrats and Republicans. The joint debates drew tremendous audiences and the feeling was so intense that men came armed, and only the coolness of the candidates prevented great loss of life. TILLMAN was reelected and very few anti-Tillmanites were elected to the legislature.

Of his service as governor it is fair to quote from his last message to the legislature, what he regarded as the achievements of his administrations:

First. The erection and endowment of Clemson College.

Second. The overthrow of the Coosaw monopoly.

Third. The just and equitable assessment of taxes on railroads and other corporations and the victory in the courts compelling them to pay.

Fourth. The passage of the dispensary law and the destruction of the barrooms.

Fifth. Refunding of the State debt, which saved $78,000 a year in interest.

Sixth. The establishment of Winthrop Normal and Industrial College for Women.

Seventh. Election of the railroad commission by the people and allowing them to fix passenger and freight rates.

Eighth. The inauguration of the primary system of party nominations for all offices in the gift of the people.

The student will search in vain for a record of achievement by any South Carolina executive to compare with this record of constructive reforms. The unfriendly critic may criticise the establishment of the dispensary system, but as we now look back upon it and recall that its establishment meant the abolishment of the barroom, we must concede that it was a long step toward the prohibition of the sale of alcoholic liquors. In theory the plan was possibly the best solution of the problem, if liquors were to be sold under any system at all, but in practice it failed because of the inability to divorce the liquor business from the politics of a State, and the dispensary system soon became so corrupt that men who at heart were not in favor of prohibition were only too glad of an opportunity to vote for prohibition in order to get rid of the dispensary system.

But no man can question the beneficial effect of the other constructive reforms above enumerated. TILLMAN by his eloquence aroused the people to a realization of their right to participate in the government of the State, and then through the primary system he furnished them the means to exercise that right. But he did not stop there. Having placed this power in the hands of the people, with the vision of a statesman he recognized that the greatest safeguard against the abuse of such power was the education of the people, and therefore in addition to extending the common schools he established during his administration the Clemson College for boys and the Winthrop College for girls. Much of the material and moral progress of South Carolina during the last 20 years can be traced to the beneficient influence of these two institutions that will ever stand as enduring monuments to the memory of Governor TILLMAN.

During his first campaign for governor, TILLMAN, in closing his speech at Anderson, S. C., said:

> How many of you can look back and recall the names of South Carolina's governors? Take out the names of the seven since 1876, and with the exception of Hayne, McDuffie, and Hammond the names of the rest are written in sand. I do not want to be such a governor. My aspiration is higher and holier than that. I would like to be a governor to whom after ages will look back and say that he was a "Carolinian and a patriot."

When one considers the far-reaching beneficial effects of the achievements above enumerated, he must conclude that the ambition of TILLMAN was gratified; that after ages will look back upon his administrations, and looking back will say "He was a Carolinian and a patriot."

At the conclusion of his second term as governor TILLMAN opposed Senator M. C. Butler, who was seeking reelection to the United States Senate. His hold upon the people was as strong as ever, and he was easily elected over his opponent. From the day that TILLMAN entered the Senate he impressed himself upon the Nation just as he had upon the State of South Carolina. His first speech in that body was delivered to a crowded Senate and a crowded gallery, and attracted the attention of the people of the entire country. In many respects it resembled his first public speech at Bennettsville, in 1885. As on that occasion the conditions were ripe for the appearance of a TILLMAN. In the South and West there was great unrest and great dissatisfaction with the administration of Cleveland, and there had begun the agitation that culminated in the free-silver fight of 1896. TILLMAN took the fight of the farmers to the Senate. Announcing that he was not familiar with the proprieties of the Senate and that he intended to use plain, blunt words, he proceeded to denounce Cleveland as no President had ever been denounced in the Senate Chamber. He pictured the economic conditions of the agricultural sections of the country as a result of the low prices for farm products, and charged the existence in Wall Street of a group of men who controlled the credit of the country, and thus the destinies of the people. The speech attracted the attention of the country. The Nation seemed about to divide itself, as South Carolina had, into Tillmanite and anti-Tillmanite camps. Pitchfork Ben became the target of the editorial writers of the East, who declared that, by the language he used, he had disgraced the Senate. The West, however, hailed him as a fearless exponent of the evils they believed to exist.

In the Senate the effect of his speech was to cause his colleagues to conclude that while he was rough and rude in his manner of speech, that he was a man of extraordinary ability, whose acquaintance might with profit be cultivated. And as they learned to know him they came to know that he was absolutely honest and sincere, and within a very short time he had won the genuine affection of the leaders of both parties in the Senate. He loved to participate in the debates, and was always a dangerous opponent because of his fund of information, his quick mind, and his ready wit. The man who interrupted him while he was speaking always regretted it. The rules of the Senate were always a source of irritation to him. Shortly after his service began he started to speak on a live subject in which he was greatly interested, but which bore no direct relation to the pending bill. A Senator, who desired to prevent his speaking, arose and asked, "Mr. President, what is before the Senate?" "I am before the Senate," said TILLMAN, and while his interrogator was counting the casualties TILLMAN proceeded to finish his speech.

He knew little of parliamentary law and cared less. The truth is that TILLMAN had no regard for any kind of law. In his consideration of a proposition there was but one question, "Is it just?" If he became convinced that the object sought to be accomplished was a just and righteous one, he was impatient of any interference by any law, rule, or regulation.

With this indifference to law, and with the absolute power that he wielded while governor, the salvation of the people was that TILLMAN acted always from impulse, and TILLMAN's impulses were always good.

It is impossible here to refer to his many achievements in the Senate. He often referred to his fight in the Fifty-seventh Congress to compel recognition of South Carolina's claim against the Federal Government for money loaned by the State in the War of 1812. By this, $386,000 of the State's bonds held by the Federal Government as a debt against the State were canceled, and $89,137.36 was returned to the State treasury in cash. That was a memorable fight because it involved the two most picturesque figures in Congressional life—Farmer Ben TILLMAN and Uncle Joe CANNON. Mr. CANNON, as chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, refused to agree to the Senate amendment to an appropriation bill providing for the payment of the South Carolina claim. TILLMAN got the floor in the Senate and declared that unless the conferees agreed to it the other appropriation bills not yet passed would never pass, because he intended to talk from then until 12 o'clock the next day, March 4, when the Congress must adjourn. At 3 o'clock in the morning TILLMAN seemed able to make good his threat and rather than provoke an extra session Mr. CANNON yielded.

During the control of the Senate by the Republicans TILLMAN was placed in charge of the railroad-rate bill, and his successful handling of it won the commendation of his colleagues.

His exposure of the frauds of the armor-plate manufacturers finally led to the construction by the Government of its own armor-plate plant.

He established the Charleston Navy Yard and has consistently labored for its development.

As chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee he devoted his time and talents to the development of the Navy, and he lived to see his efforts rewarded by the demonstration of naval efficiency in the world war that has won the plaudits of the Nation.

As a legislator TILLMAN possessed what, unfortunately, many legislators do not possess—the courage of his convictions. Former Senator Bailey, who for years sat by the side of TILLMAN in the Senate, declares that TILLMAN was not only the truest man he ever knew, but one of the most courageous. Mr. Bailey states that when the Senate was about to vote on the question of expelling Senator Lorimer that TILLMAN sent for him, and when he went to his office he saw about 100 telegrams piled upon his desk. TILLMAN handed him about a dozen of them to read. The messages from South Carolinians declared the people of South Carolina were unanimous in the belief that Lorimer should be unseated and that if he failed to vote to expel him it would endanger his reelection to the Senate. TILLMAN told him that a man who was very close to him had come to Washington that morning to advise him that if he voted against expulsion he could not be reelected. Bailey said he knew how anxious TILLMAN was to be reelected because of his interest in pending problems and stated, "TILLMAN, that is a question you must submit to your own conscience and I have no right to advise you." "I expected you to say that," said TILLMAN. "I have submitted it to my conscience, and whether I be right or wrong, on the record before us I do not believe the man should be expelled, and whatever be the consequences I shall not vote to unseat him." He went to the Senate Chamber and voted his convictions. Many South Carolinians differed with him, but they had an abiding confidence in the honesty of BEN TILLMAN and respected his courage, and I doubt whether his vote in this case alienated a single friend.

TILLMAN'S service in the Senate quickly made him a national figure and he was in great demand as a public speaker. It was CHAMP CLARK, Speaker of this House, who first suggested to a chautauqua organization that TILLMAN should be induced to go upon the lecture platform. They succeeded in inducing him to go upon a lecture tour, and thirty days after he started the president of the organization advised Mr. CLARK that TILLMAN was the best drawing card they had. While he had several lectures, his lecture upon the race problem attracted most attention. Through this lecture he undoubtedly presented to the people of the North more clearly than did any other man the view of the South upon this question. But while rendering his section a service, the fatigue of the travel, after an arduous session, weakened him physically and contributed to his physical breakdown. He was stricken with paralysis. From this stroke he recovered, and while he did not regain his former strength he continued his active service in the Senate until three days before his death on July third of this year. The last day he spent in his office I visited him and he read to me a letter he was about to send to Bennettsville, S. C., to be read at the senatorial campaign meeting scheduled for the following day. I think this was the last political act of his life and so as the curtain went up on his political career at Bennettsville in 1885, with this letter the curtain fell upon his political career in July, 1918. The intervening years he had crowded to the utmost with service to the people of South Carolina, and I make bold to say that when the history of this period is written the historian of the future, freed from the prejudice engendered by political contests, will say not only that he was "a Carolinian and a patriot," but he will say that BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN was the greatest man that South Carolina has produced.

So much for his political life. I must speak of his private life, because great as was my admiration for him as governor and Senator, greater still was my love for him as a man. In 1868 he married Miss Sallie A. Stark, of Elbert, Ga., and to this union were born six children, five of whom are living—Benjamin Ryan Tillman, jr.; Capt. Henry Cumming Tillman; Mrs. Lona Tillman Moore; Mrs. Sophia Tillman Hughes; and Mrs. Sallie Mae Tillman Shuler.

I have never known a man more devoted than Senator Tillman was to his family. His devotion to his wife was the devotion of a boy to his sweetheart, and when forced by circumstances to be separated from her for even a day he was the unhappiest man on earth. On one occasion while accompanying him to his office he informed me that that day was the anniversary of his wedding, and I shall never forget with what sincerity he spoke of the happiness of his married life. When in Washington Mrs. Tillman spent every afternoon in his office, and to her Senator TILLMAN would submit his problems and invariably be guided by her wise counsel.

During recent years there was hardly a day during the sessions of Congress that I did not either visit his office or speak with him over the telephone. I came to love him, and in return he treated me as he would one of his sons. As I learned to know him I wondered how, even in the heat of political contests, his enemies misjudged him as they did. I saw his finer qualities, his love of truth, and his hatred of hypocrisy; his love of his fellow man and his sympathy for the downtrodden and the unfortunate; his chivalrous respect for women and his love of children. I learned, too, of his simple but firm faith in a Supreme Being, and to-day, as I recall how in daily life he practiced religion, I have an abiding confidence that a just and merciful God has granted to him that eternal rest to which a life of service justly entitles him.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina assumed the Chair.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, for 40 years John C. Calhoun so thoroughly dominated politics in South Carolina that it was said, "When Calhoun took snuff the State sneezed." One of the characteristics of the volatile-minded and chivalrous people of South Carolina is hero worship. They idolized Calhoun for nearly half a century. They followed Gen. Hampton from 1876 to 1890, and they gave their indorsement to the late Senator TILLMAN, in whose memory we have met to-day, for more than a quarter of a century.

An adequate review of the activities of Senator TILLMAN in South Carolina, from the day that he began his agitation for certain reforms in the educational and governmental systems of the State until, weary with the warfare, he yielded himself in defeat to the unconquered master of man, would require the services of an historian rather than that of the eulogist. Suffice it to say that the movement in the politics of the State which gave Senator TILLMAN an opportunity for the display of his fiery and rugged eloquence was the inevitable outgrowth of conditions which had long existed and which were the results of a situation peculiar to the State.

Senator TILLMAN first attracted attention to himself by a series of articles in the Charleston News and Courier, in which he advocated the establishment of an institution for industrial and technical education. These articles drew the fire of the then brilliant editor of that paper, the late Capt. F. W. Dawson. Those who followed these brilliant exchanges were quick to see that each gladiator found in the other a foeman worthy of his steel, and that in the hitherto comparatively unknown TILLMAN there lay genius for leadership which would have to be reckoned with.

In 1885 he delivered a speech at a farmers' convention which caught the ears of a large and discontented element of the State, and created a standing interest in the uncouth but earnest man from the hill country of the State. This element made a strong fight for control of the State government in 1888, but was unsuccessful. In 1890 they called a convention, known locally as the March convention, and nominated Capt. TILLMAN for their candidate for governor. Those who opposed this movement, which was not strictly an agrarian movement, but was rather a movement representing a protest and certain demands, agreed upon Attorney General Joseph H. Earle and Gen. John B. Bratton, a brigadier general in the Confederate Army, both men of the highest character, courage, patriotism, and ability, to represent them in the contest.

The campaign began at Greenville in June of that year, and joint debates were held in every county in the State. Never perhaps in any State in the Union have there been witnessed such scenes of enthusiasm and bitterness, of crimination and recrimination, of sharp attack and sharper counterattack. However, it became very soon apparent that the people had discovered another idol, and that a tidal wave was sweeping the State from the mountain to the seaboard, and that the election of Capt. TILLMAN and his followers was inevitable.

Capt. TILLMAN was elected governor by an overwhelming majority, and immediately upon his induction into the office of governor he set about to put into law the reforms which he had so vigorously and with such masterful and powerful eloquence advocated upon the stump.

He was fought with intense bitterness at every point. The press of the State was almost unanimous against him and his program; practically every lawyer fought him, and what has since become known as big business was violently against him, but he had the support of that class of citizenship which is frequently referred to as the middle class, and he was reelected by an overwhelming vote in 1892. And with a legislature which had finally become friendly to him he succeeded during his incumbency as governor in the establishment of the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Fort Hill, the old home of Calhoun. In addition to this, the normal and industrial college for women, known as Winthrop College, was established, and which is now regarded as foremost in the Nation of institutions of this character. It was during his term as governor that the dispensary law, an imported method for the control of the liquor traffic, was put into operation, a system which proved conclusively that liquor makes bad morals and bad government. It was during this time that the primary system for the nomination of candidates for public office from the United States Senator down to township commissioner was inaugurated. An attempt was made to equalize taxation and a spectacular contest between the chief executive and certain large corporations took place, with the result in favor of the chief executive.

These and many other reforms have profoundly affected the course of affairs in the State during the last quarter of a century, and while yet a subject of controversy, it is safe to say, that the preponderance of judgment will warrant the statement that the four years of Senator TILLMAN as governor of the State witnessed more constructive and far-reaching legislation than had ever been given to the State before in a like period of time. All credit for this, however, can not be given in justice to Senator TILLMAN, for he was surrounded in his counsels by earnest and far-seeing men, and yet it would be equally unfair to deny that the larger share of credit belongs to his genius for leadership and constructive suggestion.

The historian will likely say that the reform movement, or as it is more frequently referred to "The Tillman movement," was strong and helpful in the thoroughness with which it taught the people their power, and weak in its failure, as thoroughly, to teach them how to use that power. Though the program of the reform movement at that time had included the logical sequence of all that it stood for, it should have provided for a more effective system of public education, because the possession of power without a thorough knowledge of a proper and correct use of it is most dangerous. Calmly reviewing the events of those stirring days, and the conditions that made these events possible, and the results that have come from them, the conclusion is inevitable that they were a necessary process in the evolution of popular government in the State, and that genuine democracy was advanced by them.

The biographer is likely to say that Senator TILLMAN'S most conspicuous service to the people was rendered as a State rather than as a national leader. It was in State affairs that his leadership was most conspicuous and aggressive, and he will live longest in the minds of the people for his work in State matters. His name is indissolvably linked with the two great industrial colleges for men and women. They, in themselves, are sufficient to place Senator TILLMAN on the very highest pedestal of statesmanship. These colleges are performing a service for the young men and young women of the State whose value can not be estimated.

And the primary system, crude as it was and is still, has nevertheless, brought the people in more direct control of their government, and will always be looked upon as a monument of his work, and is an evidence of the genuine democracy which, in the last analysis, was the basis of his long and remarkable domination of an overwhelming majority of his fellow citizens.

In 1894 he became a candidate for the United States Senate against General Matthew Calbraith Butler, who for 18 years had represented the State in the United States Senate with signal ability and vitality. Again the State was shaken from the mountains to the seaboard with the fury of the contest, but the result was never in doubt and Senator TILLMAN was elected by a tremendous majority.

A study of these contests will show the force and power of Senator TILLMAN in middle life. No one who witnessed them can ever forget his almost uncanny recognition of a psychological moment when addressing a popular audience. As a stump speaker, he was absolutely irresistible, and was without an equal. His vocabulary was thoroughly Anglo-Saxon, pure and pointed, the right word always in the right place. He was a student of the classics and learned deeply from them. His style was volcanically explosive, and hence almost irresistible; while his mannerisms were unique and original. His gesticulation was awkward but effective. His facial expression was a powerful asset to him as a speaker, and his voice, a high tenor, had great carrying power and was the ideal speaking outdoor voice.

It is not recorded that he ever quailed or hesitated before a dangerous situation, or that he was ever hit when he could not hit back at least a little harder. Others have imitated him and his methods with some degree of success, but his place as a campaigner before popular audiences will long remain all his own.

It had been the wish of many of his friends that in his own way he might preserve for posterity his own recollection and impression of the remarkable scenes of which he was chief actor, and it is still the hope of his friends that a competent and impartial biographer may rescue from forgetfulness these scenes.

It was not long after Senator TILLMAN took his seat as a Senator that he attracted national attention by a bitter and spectacular attack upon the Cleveland administration. These were the days when the agitation for free silver began to take possession of the imagination of the South and the West, which were then suffering from stagnation in business and from extremely low prices for farm products. His declaration, "Sixteen to one or bust," became a classic in the campaign of 1896, when gold versus silver fought their final contest for supremacy in this country. From the day of this speech until his last appearance upon the floor of the Senate he was a marked man. As he grew in experience and in age, and when responsibility began to rest more and more heavily upon him, he gradually, as is usual in all cases, began to grow more and more conservative and more and more inclined to tolerate the opinions of others. His contact with the brainiest men of the Nation was a great training for him, and his breadth of vision increased with his more comprehensive understanding of the problems and of the variety and conflicting interests of a great Republic.

Senators of the type of Chandler, of New Hampshire; the scholarly Senator Hoar and his equally scholarly colleague, Senator LODGE; the brilliant Senator Spooner; the gentlemanly and dignified Senator Hale; soon discovered in the new Senator from South Carolina, whose large brown eye blazed with the love of combat, an intellect, a courage, and wisdom, and a knowledge worthy of the best traditions of the greatest legislative body in the world. He was not long in establishing his right of leadership in this body of great men, and this he held without dispute until the fatal disease, which was his undoing, laid its hands upon him. Four times he was elected to the Senate by the almost unanimous vote of his people, and even his bitterest enemies must and do concede that his attitude as a Senator, in almost every instance, was representative of the majority thought of his State. He had a most highly developed capacity for divining public opinion, but likewise had a capacity in an equal degree toward making public opinion. He was more generally a leader of thought than a follower of it. His mind was of the imperious kind; he dominated everything about him. He loved power, but he did not abuse it.

No man in the history of the State, save Calhoun alone, so completely and for so long a time held his sway over its people, and this was not due to his personal popularity, for, while he had warm and loyal friends, he was not of the type whose success was due to a personal following. He won his way by sheer force of intellect and courage, and the belief of his followers in his patriotism and honesty. They trusted him without stint.

The home life of Senator TILLMAN was beautiful. His passionate love for flowers, his deep and abiding devotion to his family are well known. His roughness of manner and speech were more apparent than real. Under the rough exterior there was a kindly heart. Children loved him, and the intuition of children is unerring in its accuracy.

This hastily prepared glimpse of the character and service of this great man is all too brief, but eulogy can not do such a character justice. That must be left to the biographer. May he be fair and competent that the generations to come may be able to form a correct estimate of the place in history which Senator TILLMAN shall fill.

SHIP CONSTRUCTION FOR FOREIGN ACCOUNT.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask leave, out of order, to submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration. I simply wish to say that it calls for information from the Shipping Board which I think is very important in connection with matters which are now coming up. I do not think it will lead to any discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 389), as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board be, and it is hereby, directed to inform the Senate as promptly as possible—

1. Whether or not the war-time restrictions as to construction of wooden ships for foreign account in American shipyards have been removed; and if so, when.

2. Whether or not the war-time restrictions as to construction of steel ships in American shipyards for foreign account have been removed; and if not, why not; and if special instructions have been given to the Shipping Board not to remove such restrictions, by whom given.

3. What applications have been made for permission to negotiate contracts for the construction of steel or wooden ships in American yards for foreign account, and what action, if any, has been taken upon such applications, and when the same were presented.

4. What information the United States Shipping Board has as to the policy and action of other countries in regard to permitting their shipyards to enter into contracts for the construction of steel and wooden ships on foreign account.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I must insist upon going on with the unfinished business. Routine business is not in order this morning. We had no adjournment. The legislative day has not expired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought I had obtained the consent of the Senate to consider the resolution. The Chair presented the question, I know, to the Senate, and no objection was made.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not hear the request. I will state to the Senator that some time during the day I think he will find an opportunity to call up the resolution. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has given notice that he will speak this morning.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think there will be any objection to the resolution.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it can be passed now without discussion, I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did announce that there was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not object if we can put it on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the resolution will be passed over for the present.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to ask in reference to the resolution whether that information has not already been printed in pursuance of other resolutions?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I think not.

Mr. THOMAS. Has the resolution of the Senator from Washington been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that by agreement it has been passed over for the present.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; the chairman of the committee said he would not object if there is to be no discussion upon the resolution.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said if it would result in no debate I would have no objection to the passage of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear what the Senator from North Carolina said. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

REGENT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. THOMAS. I have been requested by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is necessarily absent this morning, to introduce a joint resolution and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to hear what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 195) providing for the filling of a proximate vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, which will occur on February 6, 1919, by reason of the expiration of the term of George Gray, of Delaware, be filled by the reappointment of the said George Gray for the ensuing term.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not object if it does not provoke debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no objection to it.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 187) providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13261) providing for the transportation from the District of Columbia of governmental employees whose services no longer are required, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, and Mr. GILLETT managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also transmitted to the Senate resolutions of the House on the life, character, and public services of Hon. BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina.

TRANSPORTATION OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13261) providing for the transportation from the District of Columbia of governmental employees whose services no longer are required and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12001. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was in hopes that I could have proceeded to the discussion of the bill earlier in the day. It is Saturday afternoon, and it will be impossible for me to cover all the points I desire to speak on during the day. Knowing that it is the wish of many Senators that they shall have a little of Saturday afternoon off, I shall this afternoon confine myself to but one subject.

The American people, Mr. President, have been led to believe that the requirements of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, will be but $4,000,000,000. The amount that will be required is so far in excess of this figure that I thought it was proper for the Senate, and I may say for the country, to know that instead of $4,000,000,000 the expenses of our Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, will be at least $10,000,000,000, and I hope to be able to demonstrate that fact. I hope if there is any doubt in the mind of any Senator when the figures are presented by me to-day he will ask any question he sees fit to ask, and I shall gladly give the information if possible.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope the Senator will also inform the Senate as to the accuracy, in his opinion, of the estimated expenditures for this year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Utah made an inadvertent statement. I understood the Senator to state that the country has been led to believe that the expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year 1920 would not be more than $4,000,000,000. I think the Senator meant to say it was estimated that not more than $4,000,000,000 would be required by taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I stated just exactly what I have gathered from the press of the country. I have seen not only magazines claiming four billions to be the amount required, but I have noticed daily papers from nearly all parts of the United States in which it is stated that the expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year will be $4,000,000,000, and that is to be covered by a $4,000,000,000 tax bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not deny the fact that the estimates of the Treasury Department upon which this $4,000,000,000 tax bill is based call for more than $4,000,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. I was not speaking of any estimates of the Treasury Department, nor was I speaking of the understanding of the members of the Finance Committee. This question has been discussed time and time again in the committee. I said the people of the United States were led to believe, and I know that the press of the country has been filled with statements to the effect that the imposition of a $4,000,000,000 tax is all that is necessary to pay the expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish the Senator to yield to me that I may ask the chairman of the committee if the $4,000,000,000 estimated revenue will not cover the expenditures of the Government for 1920, does he contemplate now a bond issue to carry on the expenses of 1920?

Mr. SIMMONS. The point I desire to present to the Senator from Utah is this: The Government will receive from other sources revenue besides this $4,000,000,000. It is estimated, according to my recollection, that the total amount which will be received by the Government from the $4,000,000,000 of taxes and from other sources will amount to very nearly $6,000,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no need of trying to deceive ourselves or to deceive the American people. I asked the Secretary of the Treasury when he was before the committee if it was the intention of the administration to sell bonds to partially pay the expenses of the Government for the year 1920 and he frankly answered it was. I want the people to understand that bonds are to be sold in order to pay the expenses of the Government for the year 1920, so that hereafter it may not be said that the Republicans then in control of Congress were responsible for selling bonds in times of peace to pay the expenses of the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I have sent for the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is given in his annual report. I think the Senator wants to verify this matter before it is left.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me a minute, the estimate of the department of expenditures for the present year is something over $7,000,000,000—$7,400,000,000, I think.

Mr. SMOOT. I will tell the Senator exactly if he wants to know.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have it here.

Mr. SMOOT. It is $8,089,667,298.07, less, certainly, deductions.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I have the estimate of the Treasury Department here. The total estimate is $7,284,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow me to proceed, I will——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will not the Senator permit me to correct an error in his statement?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no error in my statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator said it was expected that only $4,000,000,000 would be necessary to meet the expenses of the Government for 1920.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is mistaken. I have never said that. I said the people were led to believe that $4,000,000,000 was all that would be necessary to meet the expenses of the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow me to proceed, I am going to tell the Senate of the United States just what the estimates are for every department of the Government, and I am going to show also the amount of contracts that have been entered into by our Government that will not be paid during the present fiscal year, but will reach over into the fiscal year 1920.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will just permit me, I will not interrupt him any more, if he does not desire me to do so, about any other matter.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can interrupt me now and at any other time he chooses for a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Including the $4,000,000,000 of taxes that are expected to be realized from this bill, the total receipts of the Government for 1920 amount to $5,987,000,000, and $1,987,000,000 additional come from other sources.

Mr. SMOOT. That means for this year?

Mr. SIMMONS. For the fiscal year 1920.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the pending bill the estimated receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, are $5,987,406,000. That is to be collected on business for the year 1918 during the calendar year 1919. I am discussing the question as to the amount of taxes we shall raise on the business of 1919 to pay the expenditures of the Government beginning July 1, 1919, and ending June 30, 1920. They are two separate and distinct propositions, and I want Senators to know that they are distinct propositions. I want the people of the country to know the amount of money we shall have to raise in some way to meet the expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, will be at least $10,000,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator referred to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury before the committee that he expected bonds would have to be issued for the fiscal year 1920. Did he state how much they expected to have issued?

Mr. SMOOT. In his statement he said 40 per cent of that—the amount required—should be raised by taxation and the balance by sale of bonds.

Mr. KENYON. I have never seen that statement in the papers.

Mr. SMOOT. That was the statement made before the Finance Committee.

Now, in order that we may get this in a concise form, so that we may follow it step by step and understand just exactly what we have to meet, I am going to begin now and call attention to the appropriations that were made for the present fiscal year, and I am going to call attention to the amount in detail as well as the total appropriations. I do not believe that this afternoon I shall take the time of the Senate to go into a detailed explanation of every one of the several department appropriations, but I am going to ask that a statement of the appropriations be put in the RECORD without reading, so that any Senator who desires to examine it carefully may have it before him at any time in the discussion of the pending measure.

The statement is as follows:

Mr. SMOOT. This statement shows the regular appropriations for the present fiscal year were $17,388,678,985.25. This amount covers the regular acts, and in addition to the direct appropriations in the regular acts there were also contracts authorized to be met by future appropriations to the amount of $5,181,430,346. Then there were four deficiency acts, and the regular appropriations in those four deficiency acts were $4,325,012,456.83, and contracts authorized to be met by future appropriations amounting to $3,845,761,016. Then there were different miscellaneous acts passed, covering the Federal land-bank bonds purchase, the Federal operation of railroads, the loans to our allies, and other smaller amounts, and these amounted, in addition to the regular appropriations, to $4,270,987,863, and in addition contracts authorized to be met by future appropriations of $250,000.

Mr. President, taking all these appropriations, together with the permanents and indefinites that are carried every year in appropriation bills, the amount of the direct appropriations for the present fiscal year was $27,092,094,720.75. The total contracts authorized to be met by future appropriations for the present fiscal year were $9,027,441,362, making a total of appropriations direct and contracts authorized to be met by future appropriations of $36,119,536,082.75.

Senators will remember that when there was a report made to this body that our appropriations amounted to $36,000,000,000

I stated upon the floor of the Senate that it was absolutely impossible for the productive industries of the country to produce the goods for that amount, and at the same time furnish our allies with goods ordered by them. That statement has proven to be a fact. The Secretary of the Treasury now tells us that $18,000,000,000 will cover all the requirements of the Government for the present fiscal year, including what we advance to our allies.

In other words, Mr. President, up to the end of this year it has developed that the purchases and expenses of our Government will not amount to more than $14,500,000,000. When the appropriation bills were under discussion I stated that it was an impossibility to produce goods in the United States and furnish our allies with what we were called upon to furnish them to an amount exceeding $16,000,000,000. I think the history of the business of this country has fully justified me in that statement at that time.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator does his statement include the different funds that were voted to the President for use?

Mr. SMOOT. The item referred to by the Senator is included generally in a deficiency appropriation bill or a regular appropriation bill.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator intend to include those figures before he gets through with his statement?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the amount of the item separately. I shall look it up for the Senator and let him know exactly what it is.

I now come to the estimate of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. I have a purpose in calling attention to the appropriations of 1919 and the appropriations of 1920 separately and at this time, for I want to show to the Senate how we are going to meet the requirements of the Government for the fiscal year 1919 and then the requirements of the Government for the fiscal year 1920.

The estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, are as follows:

Agriculture, $30,048,786; Army, $1,916,905,572.16.

I want the Senate to know how this figure was arrived at. Gen. Lord and also the Secretary of War stated to the committee that the amount was arrived at as follows: When the estimate was first made for the fiscal year 1919–20 for the Army it amounted to $19,169,057,216. They stated the original estimate was based upon an army of 5,000,000 men, and the second estimate, the revised estimate that I have just called attention to, is based upon an army of 500,000 men. Therefore, 500,000 being one-tenth of 5,000,000, the amount of the second estimate should be one-tenth of the original estimate of $19,169,057,216, or $1,916,905,572.16.

In other words, Mr. President, if up to June 30, 1919, there were more men in the Army than 500,000 the estimate will not cover the requirements of the War Department, as it is based upon an army of 500,000 men only.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is merely speculative.

Mr. SMOOT. As the Senator from Wisconsin suggests, it is merely speculative. We do not know what is going to happen before peace terms are agreed upon and signed. Not only that, Mr. President, we do not know what is going to happen after they are signed. We can not tell how many men of the American Army will be kept in Europe long after June 30, 1919.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has given the total appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and also for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. SMOOT. I will give them for 1920 in a very few moments.

Mr. POMERENE. But the Senator has not thus far given any figures as to the amount of contracts for which appropriations have been made and which have been canceled.

Mr. SMOOT. I will give them to the Senator as I proceed.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, continuing with the appropriations for 1920, as estimated:

For the Diplomatic and Consular Service, $11,042,236.66.

District of Columbia, $15,928,819.

Fortifications, $574,237,273.30.

Indian appropriations, $11,939,813.89.

Legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, $116,021,816.83.

Military Academy, $6,032,862.70.

The Navy, $2,644,307,046.05.

Pensions, $220,050,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, has the Senator from Utah read the estimates for 1920?

Mr. SMOOT. I am reading the estimates for 1920.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Do those estimates carry an appropriation of $2,000,000,000 for the Navy for 1920?

Mr. SMOOT. They carry an appropriation of $2,644,307,046.05. That is the revised estimate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Has the Senator any idea that Congress will appropriate that much money?

Mr. SMOOT. I say frankly to the Senator that I think that appropriation will be made for the Navy. I do not want my position to be misunderstood. I have stated many times, and I state again, that if I am to be charged with approving of extravagant appropriations of Government moneys it will be in maintaining a Navy. I want the strongest first line of defense that it is reasonable for us to maintain.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I am perfectly willing to have the Senator do so.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator from Utah willing to build that kind of a Navy and turn it over to somebody other than an American citizen to manage it for us?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I still have unbounded faith in the ultimate judgment of Congress and of the American people, and I do not believe that is ever going to happen. I will say to the Senator that it will never happen with a vote of mine.

Mr. REED. I know that.

Mr. SMOOT. I proceed with a statement of these expenditures:

Post Office appropriation bill, $358,307,577.

Rivers and harbors, $15,870,500.

Sundry civil, $902,231,235.48.

A total, Mr. President, of the regular estimates covering the regular appropriation bills amounting to $6,822,923,539.07.

Then the permanent and indefinite appropriations, as they are called, amount to $1,266,743,759. We can not get rid of any part of that expenditure in any way, for nearly a billion dollars of it is for the payment of interest on our bonded indebtedness.

I will explain further, so as not to repeat, of what the balance of these appropriations consist. The total regular, permanent, and indefinite estimates are $8,089,667,298.07. That amount includes the sinking fund. We have a law on the statute books that requires that there shall be 1 per cent of all of the revenues of the Government set aside as a sinking fund to meet the bonded indebtedness of the Government. That law was passed back in the sixties, while the Civil War was in progress. It was passed to give stability to the United States bonds at that time, but it has never been adhered to. I have had passed through this body several times, at the request of former Secretaries of the Treasury and once at the request of Secretary McAdoo, a bill for the repeal of that law, but so far a bill of that character has failed to pass the other House. Therefore, Mr. President, it would be perfectly fair to take the amount of that sinking fund—for it will never be expended for the purpose named—off the amount of the estimated total regular, permanent, and indefinite estimates.

Mr. SIMMONS. The appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. The estimates. The 1 per cent sinking fund amounts to $287,943,883. Deducting that from the total of $8,089,667,298.07, which I have before stated, leaves a balance of $7,801,723,415.07.

In order that the Senate may know just what the estimated appropriations that must be provided for, it is only fair to take off the receipts of the Postal Service, for we have charged to the estimated amount of appropriations the amount appropriated for the maintenance of the Post Office Department. It is estimated that the receipts of the Postal Service will be $358,307,577, leaving a net amount of $7,443,415,838.07.

That is not all that we have got to meet. This afternoon I will only analyze the present condition of the authorized contracts of the War Department for which no appropriation has been made but actual contracts entered into, and the amount of same, together with the percentage of such that can be delivered during the present fiscal year and the percentage not to be delivered until the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. Has the Senator from Utah included in that amount what, if anything, the Government will have to appropriate for the railroad service and for the telegraph service? Is that included in his estimate?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President, it is not; but I have those two items, as well as others, to which I shall call the attention of the Senate.

Now, let us take the War Department and analyze the present conditions of all appropriations made to that department from April 7, 1917, the date we declared war, to the 1st day of December of this year.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before the Senator begins on that I desire to ask has he included in the figures which he has already given the amount which is necessary to pay the insurance on soldiers who have been killed?

Mr. SMOOT. That is not included.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that over $400,000,000 will be required for that purpose, and probably it may reach $600,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that those figures are not included in the amounts which I am now stating.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator include them in his final statement?

Mr. SMOOT. I would, however, say that, so far as the estimate of the officials of the War Risk Insurance Bureau is concerned, they feel that by the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1920, the premiums from now on which are paid by our soldiers who intend to maintain their insurance will be sufficient to clear off the greater amount paid for deaths caused by influenza and those who have been killed upon the battle front.

Mr. LODGE. But that bureau is now over $400,000,000 behind.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know the exact amount, but it is away behind.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. My colleague has not taken into account either the contemplated appropriation for the reclamation of arid lands, of swamp lands, of cut-over lands, and so forth, and the work of rehabilitation which many sensible people and some faddists are projecting for the future care and maintenance of the soldiers and sailors.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; nor have I taken into consideration one dollar of the amount that may be appropriated for deficiencies. This estimate does not cover a single deficiency bill. It only covers what has been estimated for by the different departments of the Government for the regular expenses of the departments.

Mr. President, let us now analyze just what appropriations for war purposes have been made and amounts that have been disbursed. These statements are from figures based upon the testimony of the Secretary of War before the Finance Committee. I want to show just what amount of contracts, obligated and unobligated, will fall due in the year 1920.

Mr. President, I ask that a copy of these estimates for appropriations be inserted in my remarks, so that any Senator who desires to see them can do so at once, without following up the interruptions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The paper referred to is as follows:

Mr. SMOOT. The total appropriations since the declaration of war on April 6, 1917, have been $24,335,281,638.62.

Mr. NORRIS. For the War Department alone?

Mr. SMOOT. For the War Department alone.

The disbursements to October 31, 1918, amount to $9,871,539,531.01. There is a balance remaining to the credit of the appropriations for the War Department of $14,463,742,107.61. Unpaid obligations to November 11, 1918—and that is the latest date as to which Gen. Lord could furnish the committee the actual figures—amount to $5,228,051,451.20, showing an unobligated balance of $9,235,690,656.41.

The estimated savings on obligations existing November 11, 1918, by the termination of contracts amount to $1,717,105,461.86. The estimated savings of unobligated balances existing November 11, 1918, amount to $5,475,303,470.85; the total estimated savings from contracts, obligated and unobligated, amount to $7,192,408,932.71.

Now, Mr. President, let us see just when and how we are to meet these obligations of the Government. After deducting all of the contracts, both unobligated and obligated, that can be canceled amounting to $7,192,408,932.71, as I have already stated, from the balance remaining in the Treasury to the credit of the appropriations of $14,463,742,107.61 leaves obligations to be met before the final completion of all contracts of $7,271,333,174.90.

The total contracts authorized since April 6, 1917, the date on which war was declared, to be met by future appropriations, up to November 11, 1918, was $8,125,717,662. Of this amount the Government has assumed obligations amounting to $1,704,107,205.07, and have been able to cancel, up to November 1 of this year, $586,031,205.07, leaving a balance to be met of $1,118,076,000.

I now wish to call the attention of the Senate to when payments of this obligation will have to be made. Of the contracts which can not be canceled, which have been authorized, but for which no appropriations have been made, it is impossible for all the goods to be delivered by June 30 next, the end of the present fiscal year. In answer to a question asked of the Secretary of War, he replied that 60 per cent would be delivered and settled for during the present fiscal year, and that 40 per cent would be carried over into the year 1920; or, in other words, there is to be carried over out of this one item $447,230,400.

Mr. President, before I pass from this item I wish to say that I received a letter in regard to it from Gen. Lord, dated December 11. I requested that he let me know whether this amount of $1,118,076,000 was a correct estimate, to go over it carefully again and let me know the result of a closer examination. I have his letter, dated December 11, 1918, which reads as follows:

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senator.

MY DEAR MR. SMOOT: I am submitting herewith a statement covering all contractual authorizations issued to the War Department bureaus and the condition of the same:

Signal Corps, $45,000,000.
Chemical Warfare Service, $150,000,000.
Medical Department, $65,000,000.
Engineer Corps, $200,000,000.
Quartermaster's Corps, $15,750,000.
Ordnance Department, $8,050,710,602.

No obligations have been made against these authorizations, with the single exception of ordnance, which shows estimated net obligations amounting to $1,260,671,573.81. The total submitted to you by me originally as the net outstanding obligations of ordnance under contractual authority granted was only $1,118,076,000.

So I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the figures that I have used, based upon Gen. Lord's estimate of a couple of weeks ago, have been increased by $142,595,573.81, and 40 per cent of this amount will be paid for in the year 1920. I do not wish it said at some time in the future that Congress did not know what they had to meet for 1920. If bonds are to be sold in a time of peace, we want to know the reason why, and it is best to set forth the reasons now, rather than one year and a half hence.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. KING. The Senator mentioned the sum of $15,000,000, as I understood him, as the contractual outstanding obligations of the Government under the head of the Quartermaster General's Department. I want to know whether I clearly apprehended the statement of the Senator. It seems to me that the obligations outstanding would be much in excess of that amount.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator misunderstood me. The figures I have given are for contracts authorized, but for which appropriations have not been made. In other words, we have authorized contracts to the amount of over $9,000,000,000 to be appropriated for later. Of that $9,000,000,000, as I have said, we entered into contracts amounting to $1,704,107,205.07 and canceled of this amount $586,031,205.07, and are still obligated for the balance of $1,118,076,000; but now we find that it amounts to $1,260,671,573.81, an increase of $142,595,573.81.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wish to be certain that I understand the Senator, my attention having been diverted for just a moment. If I understood Gen. Lord's statement and the statement which has just been made, the War Department expects to take care of all of its contracts, whether appropriated for or merely authorized, and still keep the expenditures under the actual amount appropriated, and save out of the actual appropriations about $7,200,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right, as I have stated.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; I understand that. Now, the Senator has just referred to some subsequent figures in regard to authorizations——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And I wanted to know if those subsequent figures change the first general statement which was made?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President, they do not have reference to the first general statement, because I was dealing then with direct appropriations made to the War Department; but the letter of Gen. Lord has reference to contractural obligations authorized, but not entered into other than to the extent as named in his letter.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Do I understand that the statement which the Senator now holds in his hand modifies the statement which Gen. Lord made to the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. Only as to the difference between $1,118,076,000 and $1,260,671,573.81.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. How much of a modification does that make?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a modification, in round numbers, of $152,000,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then the saving of $7,200,000,000 is reduced?

Mr. SMOOT. It is reduced by $152,000,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It is reduced by $152,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is all.

From the balances remaining to the credit of appropriations of $14,463,742,107.61 we are to deduct the total savings of direct appropriations and contract obligations of $7,192,408,932.71, leaving a balance, as I have said, of $7,271,333,174.90

The Secretary of War stated that it is impossible for all of the goods to be delivered under the contracts entered into, notwithstanding the cancellation made, during the present fiscal year. He says that there will be of the amount I have named 70 per cent of the goods delivered by June 30, 1919, and that the remaining 30 per cent will have to go over into the fiscal year 1920. Thirty per cent of the amount is $2,181,399,952.47.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that the estimates of all the departments for the fiscal year 1919–20, as I have already stated, amount to $7,443,415,838.07. Then, 30 per cent of the contracts which have been entered into, the goods under which can not be delivered during the present fiscal year but will be delivered in 1920, amounts to $2,181,399,952.47, and 40 per cent of contracts for which no appropriation was made but for which the Government is obligated, amounts to $447,230,400, or a total, Mr. President, of $10,072,046,190.54.

I wish again to call attention to the fact that this does not include deficiency appropriations that will be made for the fiscal year of 1920. I recognize that the deficiency appropriation bills for the year 1919–20 are not going to carry—at any rate, I will say to the Senator from Virginia I hope they will not carry—a hundredth part of the amount they carried for the present fiscal year; and I know from what the Senator has stated that he is going to do everything in his power to see that they are reduced to a minimum. I admit that there is no good reason why they should not be much less than for the fiscal year 1918–19; and I will also admit, Mr. President, that the Committee on Appropriations, when deficiency bills carrying appropriations by the billions were asked for for the present year, had only one idea in mind, and that was to win the war no matter how much it cost. I would not have cared if a request had been made for $5,000,000,000 more of appropriations; I never would have set myself up to be dictator as to how many men should be sent to France or what expense should be incurred; but now that the expense has been incurred I want the American people to know what they have got to meet and when they have got to meet it. I do not want to leave it, Mr. President, until some day in the future, when the American people will wake up to the fact that they have got $10,000,000,000 to meet after having been lead to believe the amount would be but $4,000,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS rose.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, I will finish along this line. There is one thing that will reduce the amount required, and that is whatever salvage we receive from the sale of war materials. Under the law to-day any amounts so received are credited to the miscellaneous account of the department to which the original appropriation was made, and if there is a billion dollars of goods not now required for war purposes sold it will reduce the expenses of the Government just that much. If there is $2,000,000,000 sold, it will reduce it just that much.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator now.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask the Senator this question: If some part of the expenditures that it has been estimated will be made during the fiscal year 1919 are not actually made, because the goods are not supplied, and therefore that amount has to go over into the fiscal year 1920 and be paid subsequently to the fiscal year 1919, has the Senator taken into account the fact that of the moneys that we propose to raise in this bill for the expenses of the fiscal year 1919 we have expressly provided in the bill that the last two installments of the excess-profits taxes and war-profits taxes shall not be paid until after the end of the fiscal year 1919?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. Therefore, if any part of the expenditures that we have intended to take care of out of the eighteen billions that have been estimated for 1918 are not taken care of because the bills do not come in, and they go over into the fiscal year 1920, so will a part of the money that we are raising by this bill go over and not be collected.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is entirely wrong, Mr. President; and I will explain to the Senator just exactly how this amount of $18,000,000,000 is arrived at.

Up until the 1st day of December, or for the first five months of the present fiscal year, there has been paid out of the Treasury, in round numbers, $8,600,000,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury stated that for the next seven months of the present fiscal year he estimated that only $9,400,000,000 would be paid out, making the $18,000,000,000 as estimated requirements of the Government, and that includes what we have got to advance to our allies.

That estimate is based upon the fact that the expenses of our Government from now on, for the next seven months, will not be as great as the expenses of the past five months. It takes into consideration the billions of dollars of contracts that we have canceled, and therefore I want to predict now that every dollar of the eighteen billions will have to be raised. Not only that, but the Senator says that in the pending bill we have provided that the last two payments of the taxes to be imposed under this bill for the year 1919 will fall into the calendar year of 1920. Yes, Mr. President; they will fall into the calendar year of 1920, but when collected will be used to take up the short-time certificates that will be sold to run the Government from June 30, 1919, until the last payment of the tax under this bill is collected. Every dollar of that must be used for redeeming the short-time certificates so sold. If that is not so, then we will have to have another bond sale or a greater one than is contemplated.

How are we to raise the $18,000,000,000, the estimated requirements of the Government for the present fiscal year? We might as well state it now as at any time. Senators know that the fourth liberty bond sale yielded the Government virtually $7,000,000,000. It is expected that under the pending bill there will be collected $6,000,000,000. Therefore the figures are, the proceeds of the sale of the fourth liberty loan bonds, seven billions; the taxes to be collected under the pending bill, six billions, making $13,000,000,000; and, Mr. President, some time next spring, perhaps the month of April, there is to be another sale of bonds. I do not know whether they will call it the fifth liberty bond sale or not, and it makes no difference what it is called; there will be another bond sale.

Mr. ROBINSON. The victory loan.

Mr. SMOOT. The people of the United States will be asked to subscribe for those bonds, and the amount must be at least $4,500,000,000 in order to cover the eighteen billions that we know the requirements of the Government will be. I say "$4,500,000,000," Mr. President, because there are other miscellaneous receipts, such as $160,000,000 from the tariff and a few other items, making, in round figures, $500,000,000; and if we do not get that amount we will have to have a larger bond sale. I expect one of $5,000,000,000. Not only that, Mr. President, but I expect the American people to be as loyal, now that the war is nearly over, as they were before. The expenses have been enormous; the American people, almost as a unit, were in favor of every necessary expense being incurred, and now the American people must be willing to meet those expenses.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator a moment ago referred to the loans which it would be necessary for us to make to the allies. Now that the hostilities have practically ceased, has the Senator any information as to the extent of these loans which will be required from us in the future?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say frankly that when the Secretary of the Treasury was asked that question he stated that he thought those loans could be floated in the regular, ordinary banking channels. He did not say positively that they could be, but he said that he expected them to be.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator's question goes to the method of raising these funds. My question was as to the amount of them.

Mr. SMOOT. I will continue, and answer the Senator's question——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before the Senator does continue——

Mr. SMOOT. I mean, upon the same subject. I want to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but the Senator has stated that it probably would be necessary for us, in order to raise the eighteen billions of dollars that it is estimated we will spend during the present fiscal year, to sell five billions and something more of bonds. Why, of course it will be necessary. The estimates of the Treasury Department show that it will be necessary. The statement of the Secretary of the Treasury is that we will get six billions from this bill, seven billions from the liberty bonds that we have already sold, and the balance of the eighteen billions, of course, will have to come from the sale of bonds. There is no other way to get it. There never has been any suggestion that it could be gotten in any other way.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not suggested anything of the kind. I was simply showing that if the $18,000,000,000 should be sufficient to meet the obligations of the Government, it would be all that it would do. The Senator says that if the entire amount of money is not spent, the balance will go over to the year 1920. Mr. President, there will be no unspent balance to go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I would not have said that but for the fact that in the early part of the Senator's speech he referred to the fact that he had predicted upon this floor that whatever amount we might appropriate and whatever amount we might estimate we would spend in this fiscal year, it would be impossible for us, because of the limitations upon the ability of the different agencies of this country to produce more than a certain limited amount, to expend more than $16,000,000,000 this year; and I understood him, in connection with that statement, to say that he now reiterated it. Therefore, I assume that he meant that although we estimate we will spend eighteen billions during this fiscal year it will be impossible for us to spend more than sixteen.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; Mr. President, I said that was without any advance to the allies. The Senator certainly has not followed me in the statement I have made.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator knows that this $18,000,000,000 estimate includes advances to the allies.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it does include advances to the allies, and my estimate of sixteen billions did not include any advances to the allies.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know what the Senator's estimate included.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, there is quite a difference between being able to furnish $14,463,000,000 between this time and June 30, 1919, and being able to furnish $7,192,000,000. Cancellations have been made, and the War Department say in their estimates that this latter amount can not be delivered within the calendar year, and that in one case—that is, the obligations by direct appropriations—but 70 per cent of the amount will be delivered, and that under the contracts for which no appropriation has been made but 40 per cent.

Now, Mr. President, reverting to the question asked by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]——

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator does not deny that if any amount of money that we may have raised by taxation or the sale of bonds is not actually expended during the fiscal year 1919 it will go over, remain in the Treasury, and be available for the payment of any expenditures that may have to be met in 1920?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, there is no doubt about it; but there will be no unexpended balance to go over. I want to say to the Senator now that during the first five months there was paid out of the Treasury $8,600,000,000. That is on the basis of an average of $1,720,000,000 every month; and the amount estimated to be paid out to reach the eighteen billions by the end of this year, or for the seven months, is but nine billion four hundred millions.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, furthermore is it not true that the peak of the expenditures, the highest amount that was expended during all of the time, was in November, after the armistice had been signed?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about it. That was the very highest month, and the expenditures during that month only fell a few dollars below $2,000,000,000.

Now, I have no doubt but that we must assist poor, stricken Europe. I have no doubt but Belgium and Serbia must be assisted. I have no doubt but France and Italy will require assistance. In fact, all that we have to do is to read the public remarks made recently by the Secretary of the Treasury, where he calls particular attention to the needs of those countries, and the obligations that we are under to them to understand his position, and the least we can do is to assist them during their reconstruction period.

What did the President say in his message delivered to the joint session of Congress on December 2, 1918, the day before he sailed for Europe, on this subject? I quote from that message:

> May I not say a special word about the needs of Belgium and northern France? No sums of money paid by way of indemnity will serve of themselves to save them from hopeless disadvantage for years to come. Something more must be done than merely find the money. If they had money and raw materials in abundance to-morrow they could not resume their place in the industry of the world to-morrow—the very important place they held before the flame of war swept across them. Many of their factories are razed to the ground. Much of their machinery is destroyed or has been taken away. Their people are scattered and many of their best workmen are dead. Their markets will be taken by others, if they are not in some special way assisted to rebuild their factories and replace their lost instruments of manufacture. They should not be left to the vicissitudes of the sharp competition for materials and for industrial facilities which is now to set in. I hope, therefore, that the Congress will not be unwilling, if it should become necessary, to grant to some such agency as the War Trade Board the right to establish priorities of export and supply for the benefit of these people whom we have been so happy to assist in saving from the German terror and whom we must not now thoughtlessly leave to shift for themselves in a pitiless competitive market.

Then he goes on to say that if the war had continued it would have been necessary to raise at least $8,000,000,000, and he recommends that $6,000,000,000 be raised instead of the eight as recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Not only that, Mr. President, there returned from Europe the other day Hon. H. P. Davison, the head of the Red Cross Association, right from the field of battle, the scenes of destruction, and here is what he says is expected of America:

> That there will be an appalling cry of humanity from all over the world no one can doubt.

Said Mr. Davison:

> The needs of France, Belgium, Italy, Russia, and the Balkans will not terminate with the formal declaration of peace. A hard winter is ahead. Exposure, and the hardships of war, and the dislocated industrial conditions of the world have produced hunger, want, and disease. There will be such distress in the world that it can not be met by voluntary organization. The Governments themselves must bear the chief burden; and I am confident that cooperation between the Governments may be relied upon in an endeavor to meet this wholesale work of relief which will be needed.

Mr. President, there is no doubt about it, and there is no question but that the government that will be called upon to do the most of this relief work will be the Government of the United States.

I could go on and quote further from the message of the President, but I will not take the time.

I have presented to the Senate the amount that will be carried over from the present fiscal year to the year 1920 in the case of the War Department alone. The Navy Department, Mr. President, has asked for $2,600,000,000, in round numbers, for the fiscal year 1919–20. In the past naval appropriation bills there have been contracts authorized, but no appropriations made, the same as in Army appropriation bills. So far we have been unable to find out what the cancellations were in the Navy Department and what the obligations of that department are that can not be finished and delivered this fiscal year and will fall into the year 1920. And, remember, the figures that I have given take into consideration simply the estimate of the department of the amount required for the year 1920.

Mr. President, I hope that we will receive a goodly sum by way of salvage from the sale of war materials. I hope that it may reach this year $2,000,000,000. When I say "this year" I mean the calendar year of 1919; and it seems to me, from the amount of goods we have on hand in some particular lines, that it ought to reach that amount. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] the other day placed in the RECORD a list of goods that the Quartermaster Department had on hand that was almost appalling in the amount of goods undistributed by that department; and yet I would rather have had all that they have on hand, and more too, than to have seen any part of the American Army suffer from cold or hunger.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator seems to have covered the proposition which he has been presenting, and in connection with it I should like to make an inquiry. Does the Senator, in presenting these estimates of appropriations, want us to infer that he would have us raise under this bill for the fiscal year 1919 more than $6,000,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I would rather take that up in its regular order, and give him my views when I reach that subject.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator now that I should like to proceed further to-night, but I have been speaking for an hour and a half and my throat is a little sore, and really I would not like to go into the subject at this time and then have to repeat it later.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course, I will not pursue it if the Senator does not care to.

Mr. SMOOT. But I am going to go over that when I get to the excess-profits tax and the war-profits tax.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I want to get the views of the Senator about the matter at some time.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; I shall be glad to cover that subject when I reach it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator very properly stated that he would prefer that we should have had any quantity of goods on hand in the Quartermaster's Department rather than take the chance of any part of the American Army suffering. Now, I understand that we have about 150,000 horses for Cavalry that need saddles. I also understand—and I will be corrected if I am in error—that there are something like 1,800,000 saddles for those horses that have been collected. I can not imagine their losing a saddle without losing the horse with the saddle, and it never occurred to me that it was necessary to have five or ten times as many saddles as we have horses. If the Senator has any information which he can give to explain this discrepancy, I should like to hear it.

Monday, December 16, 1918.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on Saturday afternoon I presented to the Senate certain figures showing that the requirements of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, would amount to at least $10,000,000,000, and, in my opinion, I desire to state now that that amount will be exceeded. The business men of this country do not object to paying the necessary taxes demanded by the Government to carry on the operations of the Government, whether during peace or war. What they do object to is a form of taxation that is discriminatory in its character, manifestly unjust, and an imposition of taxes upon one concern greater than upon another doing identically the same business, selling to the same customers, making the same profits, and yet in some cases the taxes for one are four and one-half or five times what his competitor will have to pay.

If I had no plan to offer to correct this unjustifiable discrimination, and if there was no system that could be adopted to regulate the injustice imposed upon certain business concerns under the provisions of this bill, I never would mention the fact and simply state that a law can not be written to fit all cases. But, Mr. President, such is not the case. A tax law can be written so that it will be just to every person, every partnership, and every corporation doing business in the United States.

That plan, whether it be adopted now or later, would be approved by the business men and the people of this country. I frankly admit I do not expect such a plan to be adopted at this time. I have come to the conclusion that it is absolutely useless on my part and a waste of time, as far as immediate results are concerned, to insist upon present action, but we must remember that for years and years to come the American business and the people of this country generally will be paying heavy taxes, the result of the present world war.

Therefore, I want to call attention to the fact that, on account of the discriminations in this bill, when the American people understand them thoroughly, and I wish to say that most of the business men of the country understand them to-day, there will be a movement started that will force a change in the law. The sooner it comes the better it will be for all concerned.

In my report expressing my personal views upon the pending bill I make this statement:

> If I could have framed the pending revenue bill, I would have made it very simple and so plain that any ordinary business man or individual could have understood it and would have had no trouble in making out a tax return.
> Every individual, whether in business as such or as a member of a partnership, would have been treated alike. Every corporation would have been taxed upon the same basis, and the question of capital invested, watered stock, and bonded indebtedness would not have entered into the question of the amount of tax to be imposed, with the single exception of a few corporations with a capital stock of over $1,000,000 and making undue profits during the prewar period. I would have provided a separate provision for taxing these few corporations. I would have provided for a straight war-profits tax, following the principles outlined in my amendment that I offered on January 5, 1918, to House joint resolution 195, with certain modifications to meet to-day's changed conditions.
> I believe that there should be eliminated from the bill all the harassing, nagging taxes—all of which are consumption taxes—and substituted for them a 1 per cent sale tax on all goods sold for consumption or use. A tax of that character would in no way embarrass the producer or the consumer and would yield a revenue of over $1,000,000,000.
> In addition to the 1 per cent sale tax and a straight war-profits tax, as above referred to, I would include in the bill—

But not in the bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and I shall take the time of the Senate to present to this body my views as to what that tax bill should provide and the sources from which the taxes should be collected—

> I would include in the bill title 2, income tax; title 5, tax on transportation, with certain modifications; title 6, tax on beverages, only so far as it affects alcohol, beer, wine, and the floor tax on the same; title 7, tax on cigars, tobacco, and manufactures thereof, with increased rates; title 9, the tax to be limited on automobiles, and on leases for exhibition of any positive motion-picture film; title 10, tax upon capital stock, brokers, manufacturers of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes, and on pleasure boats. All other items found in any of the above titles should be eliminated.
> If this plan were adopted, the bill would provide a larger revenue for the Government than will be received under the provisions of the pending bill, and unjust and discriminatory taxation would be avoided.

I say now it is impossible to impose an excess war-profits tax where invested capital is considered upon the business institutions of this country without the development of the rankest kind of discriminations. No definition of invested capital can be written, even though it covered pages and pages of our statute books, that could provide for all the emergencies that would arise in the thousands of businesses of this country; but if a straight war-profits tax is imposed, then, Mr. President, if a business makes a thousand dollars over and above the exemptions allowed under the pending bill, or if it makes ten million dollars, it pays pro rata the same rate of taxation.

When I proposed, in January, 1918, to House joint resolution 195 a war-tax amendment I received from all parts of the United States the highest of commendations. I received many letters similar in character to the one that I shall now refer to. The president of one of the large concerns of New York, after closely examining the amendment that I then offered, wrote me a letter, stating that after a thorough examination of the amendment, it was found that if my amendment were in force the concern would pay $245,000 more taxes than under the bill then pending, and now the present law; then followed the statement that the officers of the concern were willing to pay the increase—for it was manifest that the amendment treated all business alike—and pay a tax upon the amount of profits made, be they small or be they large.

Now, I want the Senate to understand that any law imposing taxes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, should not, in my opinion, impose taxes upon excess profits or so-called war profits. The only war profits that there could possibly be would be derived from contracts already made and entered into by our Government, the goods to be delivered within that calendar year. I can not say, Mr. President, how much such a tax would amount to, and no one else can do so. But that is the only source from which a war-profits tax could be secured.

How should the taxes for the calendar year 1919 be raised? In the first place, Mr. President, I believe that the income tax should and will remain upon our statute books. As to whether the intermediate rates, as provided in the pending bill and in the existing law, shall remain as they are is a question. If we follow the English law, we would raise such rates. But, Mr. President, I am not so much concerned about the income tax as I am about the principle which should apply in taxing individuals, partnerships, and corporations on their net profits.

Mr. President, instead of an excess-profits tax or a war-profits tax, I would impose a tax that would be equal and just and nondiscriminatory in every respect upon all businesses, whether they be carried on by an individual, a partnership, or a corporation. That can be easily accomplished simply by providing a flat normal tax, and having that normal tax apply to all the gains of the business carried on as an individual, partnership, or corporation, less certain exemptions, applying equally to all. If the net gains, less exemptions, amount to a thousand dollars, the flat normal tax is imposed upon that amount and no more; if they are $10,000,000 the flat normal tax would be imposed upon that amount. It is my opinion, Mr. President, that such a tax would be very acceptable to the great majority of business concerns of this country, with perhaps the single exception of institutions of a character that is not making to-day more than 8 per cent upon their capital stock.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not want to interrupt the Senator's trend of thought if it will interfere with him, but he made a suggestion that after this year there should be no tax upon the excess profits with the exception of such profits as grew out of war contracts. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he believes that profits growing out of war contracts should be treated differently from any other profits?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator misunderstood me if he thought I said there should be a special tax upon war profits for the year 1920. I simply stated that only those profits could be called war profits which grew out of contracts with the Government incident to the war, and in 1920 there can be no such thing as war profits unless profits of the character I mentioned are designated as such. I call the Senator's attention to the fact, however, that if a flat, normal tax is imposed it will tax all profits, whether made by institutions that are making to-day but 8 per cent, and escaping virtually all taxation, or otherwise. The Senator knows what class of institutions in this country are in that category to-day, paying very little taxes, some of them not one cent in taxes outside of the low, normal tax imposed, and yet making millions of dollars annually. We have about reached the time we must provide legislation for the collection of taxes for many years to come to meet the requirements of the Government and such legislation must be absolutely just to all concerned.

During war times Congress has enacted many laws that never could have been passed if there had not been a state of war. Legislation has been passed by Congress, and is now upon the statute books, which the American people will demand of Congress its repeal, and rightly and justly so. Therefore, when we are talking about passing a revenue bill for the future, let us take time, Senators, and pass a bill levying taxes that no institution in this country, no individual, and no partnership can say are unjust or discriminatory. There is no necessity for passing any other kind of a law, and the 1920 provisions of the pending bill can be charged with all the defects of the provisions imposing taxes for the calendar year 1918.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator to say a little while ago that in his judgment the expenditures for the fiscal year 1920 would amount at least to $10,000,000,000. Does not the Senator think, if our expenditures should reach that figure, that at least $6,000,000,000 of that amount will be on account of the war and should be treated just the same as we treat war expenses now?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, if that program is to be carried out, it means that for a number of years in the future there will be sales of bonds by our Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a question in that connection?

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to finish my answer to the question of the Senator from North Carolina, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator think that all of the sums to be expended in the year 1920 should be raised by taxation? Does the Senator oppose the issuance of any bonds for that year if our expenditure should reach $10,000,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah believes that if we now know we are to meet an expenditure of $10,000,000,000 in 1920, as I am sure we will, I would very much prefer to impose additional taxes upon the business of 1918, when we know that profits have been large, rather than to force additional taxes upon the business of 1919, when no human being can tell what the profits of that year will be.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. In that connection I wish to say to Senators that the estimated revenue of $4,000,000,000 to be derived from the taxes imposed for the year 1920 can hardly be justified. I think that is as mild a way as I can put it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has stated that, in his opinion, the expenditures for 1920 will be at least $10,000,000,000. I want to ask the Senator, first, whether included in that amount is any sum that may be advanced to the allies, or are such sums excluded from the $10,000,000,000 of estimated expenditures?

Mr. SMOOT. They are excluded, I will say to the Senator. I stated on Saturday—I do not know whether the Senator was then in the Chamber—that the Secretary of the Treasury is of the opinion that beginning with the calendar year 1919 advances would have to be made to our allies, but they would be furnished through the regular channels of banking; in other words, the obligations of our allies would be issued, and no doubt sold in this market; but the Treasury of the United States would not be compelled to advance very much more to our allies.

Mr. ROBINSON. I heard the statement as made by the Secretary himself and as repeated by the Senator on the floor on Saturday. The Senator said, in reply to a question propounded by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], that under the system provided in this bill and implied in the question of the Senator from North Carolina, this Government would be issuing bonds for a great many years; but the Senator from Utah did not answer my question. My question was, assuming the Senator's estimate to be correct that the expenditures of this Government for 1920 will be at least $10,000,000,000, and that may be increased by a couple of billion dollars advanced to the allies, whether he favors the raising of all that sum by taxation, or whether under those circumstances he would be willing to raise a portion of it by bonds?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the difficulty of trying to legislate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, at a time when war profits are ceasing and reconstruction profits beginning, is demonstrated by the question just asked. We should not legislate now for 1920. We do not know, nor can we fairly estimate, what the business of 1920 is going to be; we do not know, nor can we reasonably estimate, what the profits will be. But if the profits are as in normal years I will say to the Senator that it will be absolutely impossible to raise $10,000,000,000 by taxation, because that is about all the profits that are made in ordinary times.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then, if that is the case, if the expenditures will be at least $10,000,000,000 and it proves impossible to raise that much by taxation, we will be compelled to issue bonds, will we not?

Mr. SMOOT. We will be compelled to issue bonds, but I want the people of the country to know that fact now. I do not want a realization of that fact to be left until the time comes when the bonds must be issued, when the Democratic press and politicians will claim that the Republican Party is responsible for issuing these bonds in time of peace. They will claim that the pending bill providing an estimated revenue of $4,000,000,000 for the year 1920 was ample to meet the requirements of the Government. I say now, Mr. President, that it is not ample.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now to another question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has stated that it is absurd, or substantially that, to undertake to provide now for the funds necessary for expenditures in 1920. When does the Senator think that they should be provided for?

Mr. SMOOT. I think they should be provided for some time during the calendar year 1919 at a time when we will know more about prospective profits than we do now.

Mr. ROBINSON. Some time during the calendar year?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator, of course, is aware that it must be done either during the present short session or during the next long session, which does not begin until the first Monday of December. Does the Senator favor an extra session of Congress during the year 1919 for the passage of a revenue law?

Mr. SMOOT. I favor an extra session of Congress during the year 1919, not only to pass a revenue law but to see that many of the laws now upon the statute books are repealed; laws the American people are restive under.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, if we wait until 1919 to pass a revenue law, we will still be passing it in advance of 1920. The Senator, then, does concede that the revenue law for 1920 must be passed before 1920. Now, let the Senator tell the Senate what difference three months or four months will make, in so far as the determination of the question of policy is concerned, as to whether we shall raise all the money necessary for our expenditures by taxation, or part of it by bonds? The only advantage that will result is that the Senator's party will be in power in Congress after the 4th of March. Is not that true?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the fact that the Republican Party will be in power will prove a great advantage to the people of this country.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator thinks so, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only that, but the Senator is wrong as to his "three or four months." The Senator knows, and has had enough experience in passing revenue legislation to know, that it will be nine months before the bill could be enacted into law and signed by the President, and by the end of nine months we will know something about the condition of business in this country. Not only that, Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield for a further question?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator, of course, knows that at any time subsequent hereto the Republican Party, when it is in power in both Houses, can pass any legislation it chooses, assuming that it has a majority; and if this Congress passes a measure that should be repealed, the Republican Party can repeal it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am fully aware of that; but the whole proposition resolves itself into this——

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will pardon a further statement, I will conclude what I was saying, and that is that he is trying to prove an alibi for his party in advance.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it is very disagreeable to the Senator from Arkansas even to have the people understand the true situation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; I hope the Senator does not understand that I am not in the very best of good humor.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that the business men of this country and the people generally who pay taxes ought to know the amount that will be required by the Government for the fiscal year 1919–1920, and I believe the people of the United States are loyal enough to meet every demand made upon them, but every tax imposed upon them must be just and equitable.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield again for a statement in that connection? I agree with every word that the Senator has said, that the people of the country should be informed now, in so far as that information can be given them, just what they will have to meet in 1920. I do not think it is within the power of any person to say just exactly what that sum will be; but if we are to tell them what they will have to meet, why not tell them how much they will have to pay and how that may be paid, and give them the advantage of adjusting their business to meet those payments? Why wait until the business of the country has adjusted itself upon the basis of a $6,000,000,000 taxation, and every man who sells goods sells them upon the theory that he is going to pay the tax carried in this bill, and then, after he has collected this enormous amount from the consumers, reduce it? Why not give the people the advantage of both the information as to how much the expenditures of the Government will be in 1920 and the information as to how much they will have to pay then?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that the business interests of this country have, and the American people at the recent election declared by their votes that they have, confidence in the Republican Party in readjusting the future affairs of the country, and they know full well that all the money necessary to maintain the Government will be raised by that party, and in a way that will bear lightest upon the people. I can not see why we should not have an extra session of Congress. Are there any good reasons why we should not?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. Suppose there should not be an extra session of Congress. The result would be that the provisions of the present bill would probably be extended to 1920, would they not?

Mr. SMOOT. Not necessarily so. There will at least be another session of Congress by December of 1919, and the Republican Party, then in control, can at least pass a resolution imposing a different rate of taxation than that imposed by the present law before it is time to make returns for 1920, and the business men of this country know——

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but will the Senator yield further? If we wait until that time arrives, the people of the country will not get the benefit of any reduction that may then be made in the taxes, or, at least, the people of the country will not get all the benefit of that reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the difference between the 1920 tax so imposed and the tax of 1919 will never be felt by adding to the price for which the goods will be sold.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to proceed in some kind of order in what I have to say. I am perfectly willing to yield for a question, but not for an argument.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not going to make an argument. I want to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator, assuming that this bill is passed with the amendment of 1920, and assuming that the taxes are collected upon the basis of this bill and passed on to the people of this country in the price of products, as we know they will be, if at the close of the calendar year 1920 the Congress in next December shall remit one-third of the six billions of taxes collected out of the people, who will get the benefit of the $2,000,000,000 which may be remitted?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that will depend entirely upon what kind of a bill they are going to have for 1920. I say now that the difference of rates of taxation between the two bills will be so small that so far as the retail price of the goods is concerned it will make no difference. The Senator knows that goods generally are sold for all they will bring, tax or no tax, and that will be continued. What we want to do, if we do not want to destroy business entirely, is to let competition regulate those things, and I am quite sure it will.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

When interrupted, Mr. President, I was discussing the question of what I thought the taxes ought to consist of, beginning with the fiscal year 1919–20, and I had reached the point of explaining a flat normal tax upon all net gains. In addition to a flat normal tax upon all net gains, I would impose a 1 per cent sales tax; and in this connection I might say that we ought to provide a sinking fund, not this year, perhaps not next year, because of the large amount of taxes to be collected, but surely the following year. Senators must remember that the bonds of the United States will begin falling due within five years, with no provision whatever for meeting them. I believe that the bonded indebtedness of this Government should be met by all the people, and not by any one class. I trust that the principle of providing a sinking fund will be the policy of the Republican Party, at least, and I might say of any party that may in the future be in power.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; for a question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to renew the question which I asked of the Senator on Friday.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will just wait, I will answer it in connection with another subject I intend to discuss.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well; then I will withhold the question at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. There are other sources from which the Government can obtain revenue for the year 1920. The receipts from imports for the present calendar year will be not to exceed $160,000,000. We should amend the existing tariff law so that it would yield to the Treasury of the United States $350,000,000 to $400,000,000 per annum.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask the Senator if he thinks, if the tariff is to be revised, that the time between now and the next session of Congress will be an opportune time to revise it, in view of the unsettled condition of prices of labor and materials throughout the world, and especially in the countries that we have to meet, in which we have our chief competitors in our own market?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was not suggesting that the tariff act be revised at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator was, at a special session.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as that is concerned, it would not be a bad idea to revise it at a special session, and my opinion is that it will be revised at an early date. I now state that the Simmons-Underwood tariff act will not remain on our statute books many months longer.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was not asking whether the present tariff act will be repealed or not. I was asking, if the present tariff act is to be repealed when the Republican Party comes into power, in view of the unsettled conditions as to the cost of labor and materials in that part of the world where we meet our strongest competition, if the Senator thought that between now and the time for the assembling of the regular session next December would be an opportune time and a proper time in which to revise the tariff?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think it would be very proper indeed to revise the tariff during that time, though not as a whole. It will be revised as conditions change in the world; and when normal conditions are reached in the United States I wish to say now that the rates of tariff imposed by the Simmons-Underwood tariff act must be changed or the American market is going to be taken by foreigners.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator kindly let me proceed?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I just want to ask the Senator if he expects to substitute the Payne-Aldrich Act for the Simmons-Underwood Act?

Mr. SMOOT. As between the two, and within two years, if the substitution were made it would be a godsend to the country; yet I say there were rates in the Payne-Aldrich Act that will never be reenacted into law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Unless I am allowed to proceed I will yield the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator a question, and if the Senator does not want to answer it he need not. When he started out he said he would be glad to have Senators ask him questions.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been on the floor nearly an hour and a quarter, and the RECORD will show a great part of that time has been taken by interruptions such as the last one, about the Aldrich Tariff Act, and a lot of stuff that has no reference whatever to the pending bill. I am getting tired of it. If Senators want to know anything about the bill, they may ask questions and I will answer them if it is in my power to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator this question, and he can answer it or refuse to answer it, as he wishes. Without reference to what he calls the Simmons-Underwood Act or the Payne Act that is to be the tariff measure in the future, I want to say, parenthetically, that I do not believe either one of those measures will at all suit the conditions that obtain when the war closes. But if the Senator wants to reenact the Payne-Aldrich Act or some similar act to it, I wish to ask him if he wants a special session of Congress in which to reenact that measure during the coming calendar year?

Mr. SMOOT. There will be many pressing matters that should be acted upon in a special session of Congress other than a revision of the tariff. I say, however, that there should be a change in the present tariff law, and there should be a change as soon as possible, and as new conditions develop in this country further changes will be necessary, for I know that the keenest competition that has ever been experienced in all the world is going to follow when the reconstruction of the countries in Europe is completed. I know the best market in all the world is the American market, and it is going to be exploited by foreign countries, and there is no way to keep out foreign goods except by the enactment of a tariff law. Whether it comes during the special session or later, I say that it will come, and, Mr. President, it will come no matter what party is in power.

The present tariff law can not remain in force and the workingmen of this country have employment; I mean when normal conditions are reached in the United States, and in the world. How soon they will be reached nobody can tell. It may be a year, it may be two years, it may be three years, but the time is coming when they will be reached.

In mentioning the tariff question as I did I had no idea that a revision would be incorporated in the pending bill or any revenue bill. I simply mentioned it as one of the sources from which revenue could be derived for the Government for its future needs.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in his response to the question of the Senator from Arkansas, of course the natural inference was that the Senator meant he wanted to revise the tariff in order to get a supplement to the revenues for 1920.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is mistaken. It was not in answer to the question asked by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have had no answer to my question yet. I am not differing from the Senator in his statement of conditions that will undoubtedly develop and obtain as a result of the war; I do not say there will not be a necessity for some change in the tariff, but what I wanted to know was whether the Senator meant that he was in favor of an extra session during the next calendar year for the purpose of revising the tariff and increasing our governmental receipts.

Mr. SMOOT. I have answered the question already, but I will answer it again. I am in favor of an extra session of Congress. During that extra session of Congress I would be in favor of modifying the present tariff law, and not only modifying the present tariff law but passing a just and equitable revenue bill and proper reconstruction legislation.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator then is in favor of revising the present tariff law and making a new tariff law before he knows what are going to be the conditions in foreign countries upon which every tariff law, according to the theory of his party, ought to be based.

Mr. SMOOT. As the Senator knows, or every Senator with the exception of the Senator from North Carolina, there are changes necessary in the present tariff law under existing conditions, and those are the changes I would have made during the extra session of Congress. I have said two or three times already that further changes would be necessary as new conditions developed. That is my position.

Mr. President, I think the best way to provide a sinking fund to meet the payment of the bonded indebtedness of the Government is by the imposition of a consumption or sales tax. The rates can be so small that it will never be a burden on any class of people—$10 on a thousand dollars of actual purchases for consumption or use. There is another advantage in such a tax being imposed upon the consumer, as it does not impose a tax upon the manufacturer, wholesaler, or jobber and prevents the tax being passed on from one dealer to another with increased amount added by each turnover. Past experience has proven that a 5 per cent tax imposed upon the manufacturer often is the excuse for the imposition of a 20 per cent tax by the retailer upon the ultimate consumer.

If the sales tax is not adopted for raising revenue to meet the running expenses of the Government, I do hope and trust that it will be adopted in the near future to provide a sinking fund to pay the obligations of the Government.

Mr. President, I may differ from my associates in relation to an inheritance tax. I do not believe that the pending measure should impose a tax of any sort upon inheritances. I am not going into a long discussion of it, but will content myself by saying that I believe the imposition of inheritance taxes should be left entirely to the States. The only excuse for collecting any part of an inheritance must be based upon the granting of a power to transfer the property of a decedent, and that privilege can only be granted by the State and not by the Federal Government. In some of the Western States there have been withdrawn public lands in some instances to the amount of 80 per cent of the area of the State. Those States are only allowed to tax the land in private ownership. They must raise from a limited source of taxation the money to maintain all the institutions of the State, and in some cases it becomes a burden so irksome that it is next to impossible to bear. People wonder why manufacturing concerns in such States are not increasing. When we stop to think that in many cases the total taxes run over 4 per cent we must of necessity admit that it is impossible to compete with like business in States where taxes are not half the amount.

I shall vote to strike out every inheritance tax in the pending measure if I have a chance to do so, as I did in the committee.

Mr. President, the provisions of the bill are unjust in the imposition of taxes as between individuals, partnerships, and corporations. I know that under the provisions of the bill it is impossible to prevent it. I have thousands of letters showing the inconsistencies in actual cases as between businesses of a similar and like character. In this connection I want to read a letter just received from a firm in Chicago:

> We received yesterday a copy of the proposed revenue law as reported by the Senate committee, and according to its provisions we would have paid on last year's business over a million and a quarter dollars in excess of what we would have paid had we been incorporated. This you will see would compel us to pay over 25 per cent more than the most unjust amount we paid last year.

Then he proceeds with an exposition of the profits of a corporation doing a similar business and shows a difference in favor of the corporation under this bill of nearly $500,000 taxes. The two concerns are engaged in the same class of business and practically the same amount with like profits, and yet that discrimination exists. You can not defend such a discrimination, and yet it exists in the pending bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina for a question?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has read a letter from a party, and the letter was read in the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Not this letter.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a letter from a big concern, and I suppose the result indicated in that case was because it was a big partnership and did not distribute any of their profits. If they had been a corporation they would have done so, but a partnership does not.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has stated the case wrong. Being a partnership, the tax must be paid; but in the case of a corporation no tax would have to be paid on the undistributed earnings.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly what I said, but the Senator did not understand me. As a partnership they are not compelled to distribute and they are taxed.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not what the Senator said. The Senator said just the reverse.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I did not make myself clear. That is what I meant. The partnerships are not compelled to distribute, but they are taxed just as if they did distribute. If the corporations were taxed and did not distribute they would only have to pay the taxes the Senator mentioned. That makes the difference.

But that is not the question I desire to propound to the Senator. That letter was read to the committee and discussed. I wish to ask the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that this letter was not read to the committee or discussed. I only received the letter this morning. But that makes no difference, as far as the principle is concerned. I can point to hundreds of such cases——

Mr. SIMMONS. What I want to ask is, Does the Senator mean to tell the Senate that this bill will require partnerships to pay a larger tax than corporations, in view of the fact that corporations are subject to war-profits and excess-profits taxes, and partnerships are not subject to either of those forms of taxation?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator had waited I would have explained the difference. As between partnerships and corporations, partnerships are discriminated against in this bill in case the earnings of a corporation are retained in the business.

I have already stated that there is no law which can be written that will equalize taxation under a plan of excess profits where capital stock, intangible assets, borrowed money, and all the questions that are involved in the pending measure are to be a factor.

Mr. President, I have copies of resolutions which have been sent to me from thousands of organizations indorsing the 1 per cent sale tax; and I say now that sooner or later it will be adopted in our tax system in some form or other.

I have received from Senators many letters asking about the relief provisions contained in the pending bill. I think it proper to take up these relief provisions, beginning with section 200 of the bill, and to place them in the RECORD in such a way that any Senator can refer to the RECORD and see at once all the relief provisions in the bill, and if appearing more than once just where found and to what subject they refer to.

I will first call attention to the definition of a "personal service corporation." In section 201, page 4, from line 20 to line 26, is the definition of a "personal service corporation," and it reads as follows:

The term "personal service corporation" means a corporation whose income is to be ascribed primarily to the activities of the principal owners or stockholders who are themselves regularly engaged in the active conduct of the affairs of the corporation and in which capital (whether invested or borrowed) is not a material income-producing factor.

Next, the question relative to the taxation of personal-service corporations as partnerships, which will be found in section 218, subdivision (e), page 34, line 24, to line 11 on page 35, is as follows:

(e) Personal-service corporations shall not be subject to taxation under this title, but the individual stockholders thereof shall be taxed in the same manner as the members of partnerships. All the provisions of this title—relating to partnerships and the members thereof shall so far as practicable apply to personal-service corporations and the stockholders thereof: Provided, That in the case of any such corporation any amounts distributed during its taxable year shall be taxed to the distributees; and any portion of the net income remaining undistributed at the close of its taxable year shall for the purposes of this subdivision be assigned to the stockholders of such corporation at the close of its taxable year in proportion to their respective shares.

Referring to the individual income tax title—

The reason for this remedial provision arises from the following fact: Personal-service corporations many times have very little capital invested, yet there are exceedingly large profits produced by the personal efforts of the members of the corporation. If only the exemptions were allowed under the corporation provisions of the pending measure they would be very small, and in every case which was brought to the attention of the committee, at least, their gains would fall under the highest percentage bracket, and there would be imposed upon them a tax which would be very unjust. After the distribution was made they would also be taxed on the income, or on that portion that was left after paying taxes on the net profits of the corporation.

Again, section 231, subdivision (14), page 52, line 20, exempts such corporations from income tax; and section 304, subdivision (a), page 88, lines 1 to 4, relieves them from the excess-profits tax.

Section 303, page 87, lines 12 to 24, provides for excess-profits tax where the corporation is engaged in business requiring capital, and also business which if carried on alone would make the corporation a "personal-service corporation."

I ask that these be inserted in the RECORD without reading. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

(14) Personal-service corporations.

SEC. 304. (a) That the corporations enumerated in section 231 shall, to the extent that they are exempt from income tax under Title II, be exempt from taxation under this title.

SEC. 303. That if part of the net income of a corporation is derived (1) from a trade or business (or a branch of a trade or business) in which the employment of capital is necessary, and (2) a part (constituting not less than 30 per cent of its total net income) is derived from a separate trade or business (or a distinctly separate branch of the trade or business) which if constituting the sole trade or business would bring it within the class of "personal-service corporations," then (under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary) the tax upon the first part of such net income shall be separately computed, and the tax upon the second part shall be the same percentage thereof as the tax so computed upon the first part is of such first part.

Mr. SMOOT. The next relief provisions are with reference to dividends payable to recipients at the rate for the year in which the corporation earns the profits from which the dividend is declared. Section 201, subdivision (d), page 7, lines 1 to 6, reads as follows:

(d) Any dividend received by a taxpayer shall be taxed to the recipient at the rates prescribed by law for the years in which the corporation accumulated the earnings or profits from which such dividend was paid, but the dividend shall be deemed to have been paid from the most recently accumulated earnings or profits.

The next is, exchange of property, stock exchange in reorganizations or mergers, section 202, subdivision (b), page 7, from line 17 to line 4 on page 8, reads as follows:

(b) When property is exchanged for other property the property received in exchange shall for the purpose of determining gain or loss be treated as the equivalent of cash to the amount of its fair market value, if any; but when in connection with the reorganization, merger, or consolidation of a corporation a person receives in place of stock or securities owned by him new stock or securities of no greater aggregate par or face value, or when a person or persons owning property receive in exchange for such property stock of a corporation formed to take over such property, no gain or loss shall be deemed to occur from the exchange, and the new stock or securities received shall be treated as taking the place of the stock, securities, or property exchanged.

Rates for the calendar year 1919 and subsequent years. First, in reference to the individual normal income tax, section 210, page 10, line 21, down to and including line 19, on page 11, reads:

SEC. 210. That, in lieu of the taxes imposed by subdivision (a) of section 1 of the revenue act of 1916 and by section 1 of the revenue act of 1917, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every individual a normal tax at the following rates:

(a) For the calendar year 1918, 12 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 216: Provided, That in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States the rate upon the first $4,000 of such amount shall be 6 per cent;

(b) For each calendar year thereafter, 8 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 216: Provided, That in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States the rate upon the first $4,000 of such amount shall be 4 per cent.

Then subdivision (a) has reference to the imposition of the tax for the calendar year ending June 30, 1920, or a reduction of one-third from the tax imposed for the year 1919.

The corporation income tax, found in section 230, page 47, line 17, down to and including line 13 on page 49, as follows:

SEC. 230. (a) That, in lieu of the taxes imposed by section 10 of the revenue act of 1916, as amended by the revenue act of 1917, and by section 4 of the revenue act of 1917, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation other than a life insurance company a tax at the following rates.

The rates are the same as provided for under the individual income tax title. There is, however, in this section, under subdivision (b), a change from the schedules on individual incomes. It reads as follows:

(b) For the purposes of the act approved March 21, 1918, entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners and for other purposes," five-sixths of the tax imposed by paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) and three-fourths of the tax imposed by paragraph (2) of subdivision (a) shall be treated as levied by an act in amendment of Title I of the revenue act of 1917.

In the operation of transportation systems of the United States the Government, under an agreement with those corporations, pays to-day the original normal tax imposed of 2 per cent, all other taxes to be paid out of the revenues of the corporations. Under this section a normal tax of 12 per cent is imposed. Therefore the railroads are compelled by this amendment to pay 10 per cent of the 12 per cent, the Government paying only the 2 per cent, as provided for in the agreement with the corporations. Three-fourths of the tax imposed under this relief provision means three-fourths of the 8 per cent for the year 1920, which means that the transportation companies shall pay 6 per cent of the 8 per cent, and the Government pay 2 per cent, as in the original agreement.

I come now to the life insurance income tax, as found in section 245, page 67, lines 2 to 17, as follows:

SEC. 245. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every life insurance company a tax, as follows:
(a) In the case of a domestic life insurance company—
(1) For the calendar year 1918, 12 per cent of its net income;
(2) For each calendar year thereafter, 8 per cent of its net income.

That also has reference to the tax for 1820.

(b) In the case of a foreign life insurance company—
(1) For the calendar year 1918, 12 per cent of the same proportion of the net income which the reserve fund upon business transacted within the United States is of the total reserve fund upon all business transacted, whether within or without the United States;
(2) For each calendar year thereafter, 8 per cent of such proportion of its net income.

This has reference to foreign insurance companies, and the latter paragraph—namely, paragraph 2—has reference to the tax for 1920.

The war excess-profits tax on corporations is provided for in section 301, page 83, line 21, to page 85, line 3, as follows:

SEC. 301. (a) That in lieu of the tax imposed by Title II of the revenue act of 1917, but in addition to the other taxes imposed by this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for the taxable year 1918 upon the net income of every corporation a tax equal to the sum of the following:

FIRST BRACKET.

Thirty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the excess-profits credit (determined under sec. 312) and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

SECOND BRACKET.

Sixty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

THIRD BRACKET.

The sum, if any, by which 80 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the war-profits credit (determined under sec. 311) exceeds the amount of the tax computed under the first and second brackets.

In order that Senators may see just how this system works out, I will insert at this point the tax that would be paid by a corporation with three stockholders, invested capital of $1,800,000, and with an income of $1,800,000.

Rates for calendar year 1919 and subsequent years continued:

(b) For the taxable year 1919 and each taxable year thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the net income of every corporation a tax equal to the sum of the following:

FIRST BRACKET.

20 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the excess-profits credit (determined under sec. 312) and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

SECOND BRACKET.

40 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

I will not read the remainder because it is simply a reduction from the rates imposed for the calendar year 1919 applying to the calendar year 1920.

Perhaps there is no relief provision in the bill so sweeping as that in relation to oil and gas wells and mines. First, as to the sale of the mine, surtax and excess-profits tax limited to 20 per cent of the selling prices, as found in section 211, subsection (b), page 18, line 3 to line 9, is as follows:

(b) In the case of a bona fide sale of mines, oil or gas wells, or any interest therein, where the principal value of the property has been demonstrated by prospecting or exploration and discovery work done by the taxpayer, the portion of the tax imposed by this section attributable to such sale shall not exceed 20 per cent of the selling price of such property or interest.

Again, section 337, page 107, lines 14 to 20:

SEC. 337. That in the case of a bona fide sale of mines, oil or gas wells, or any interest therein, where the principal value of the property has been demonstrated by prospecting or exploration and discovery work done by the taxpayer, the portion of the tax imposed by this title attributable to such sale shall not exceed 20 per cent of the selling price of such property or interest.

Next comes the depletion allowance. The basis of value is as of March 1, 1913, in case of property acquired before that date, and at date of discovery or 12 months thereafter in case of property discovered since March 1, 1913, where value is materially disproportionate to cost; that is found in section 214, subdivision (a), paragraph 10, page 28, line 7, and line 2 on page 29.

Section 234, subdivision (a), paragraph 9, page 58, is as follows:

(9) In the case of mines, oil and gas wells, other natural deposits, and timber, a reasonable allowance for depletion and for depreciation of improvements, according to the peculiar conditions in each case, based upon cost including cost of development not otherwise deducted: Provided, That in the case of such properties acquired prior to March 1, 1913, the fair market value of the property (or the taxpayer's interest therein) on that date shall be taken in lieu of cost up to that date: Provided further, That in the case of mines, oil and gas wells, discovered by the taxpayer, on or after March 1, 1913, and not acquired as the result of purchase of a proven tract or lease, where the fair market value of the property is materially disproportionate to the cost, the depletion allowance shall be based upon the fair market value of the property at the date of the discovery or within 12 months thereafter; such reasonable allowance in all the above cases to be made under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary. In the case of leases the deductions allowed by this paragraph shall be equitably apportioned between the lessor and lessee.

GOLD-MINING CORPORATIONS—RELIEF FROM EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

Section 304 (d), page 88, lines 12 to 18:

(d) In the case of any corporation engaged in the mining of gold the portion of the net income derived from the mining of gold shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this title, and the tax on the remaining portion of the net income shall be computed upon the basis of an invested capital which bears the same ratio to the full invested capital as such remaining portion of the net income bears to the entire net income.

INVESTED CAPITAL.

Section 327 (e) (3), page 100, lines 4 to 7 and 14 to 24, provides that the profits tax shall be determined on the basis of representative corporations (without regard to the invested capital of the taxpayer):

(e) Where the invested capital is materially disproportionate to the net income as compared with representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business because: * * *

3. The net income for the taxable year is abnormally high due to the realization in one year of (a) gains, profits, or income earned or accrued during a period of years or (b) extraordinary gains or profit derived from the sale of property the principal value of which has been demonstrated by prospecting or exploration and discovery work done by the taxpayer. When the tax is determined under this paragraph proper allowance shall be made for the taxes which would have been payable in prior years if the gains, profits, or income earned or accrued in such years had been taxed at the rates then applicable.

INVENTORY AND OTHER LOSSES RESULTING FROM WAR CONDITIONS.

Inventory losses deducted from income of preceding taxable year. Section 214 (a) (12), page 29, line 19; page 30, line 8 (same provision in respect to corporations in sec. 234 (a) (13), p. 60, lines 5 to 19):

(12) If it is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner that during the taxable year 1919 or 1920 the taxpayer (a) has for the first time ascertained the amount of a loss sustained during the preceding taxable year and not deducted from the gross income therefor, or (b) has sustained a substantial loss (whether or not actually realized by sale or other disposition), resulting from any material reduction (not due to temporary fluctuation) of the value of the inventory for the preceding taxable year, then the amount of such loss shall be deducted from the net income for such preceding taxable year, and the taxes imposed by this title and by Title III for such year shall be redetermined accordingly. Any amount found to be due to the taxpayer upon the basis of such redetermination shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 252.

Net losses during 1917 and 1918 deducted from income of succeeding taxable year.

Net losses during 1919 and subsequent years deducted from income of preceding taxable year, and any excess remaining deducted from income of succeeding taxable year.

Section 204, page 8, line 15, to page 10, line 8:

SEC. 204 (a) That as used in this section the term "net loss" refers only to net losses resulting from either (1) the operation of any business regularly carried on by the taxpayer, or (2) the bona fide sale by the taxpayer of plant, buildings, machinery, equipment, or other facilities constructed, installed, or acquired by the taxpayer on or after April 6, 1917, for the production of articles contributing to the prosecution of the present war; and when so resulting means the excess of the deductions allowed by law (excluding in the case of corporations amounts received as dividends from a corporation which is taxable under this title upon its net income) over the sum of the gross income plus any interest received free from taxation both under this title and under Title III.

(b) If for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1916, and ending not later than December 31, 1918, it appears upon the production of evidence satisfactory to the commissioner that any taxpayer (other than a life insurance company) has sustained a net loss, the amount of such net loss shall under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, be allowed as a deduction in computing the net income of the taxpayer for the succeeding taxable year.

(c) If for any taxable year ending after January 1, 1919, it appears upon the production of evidence satisfactory to the commissioner that any taxpayer (other than a life insurance company) has sustained a net loss, the amount of such net loss shall under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, be deducted from the net income of the taxpayer for the preceding taxable year; and the taxes imposed by this title and by Title III for such preceding taxable year shall be redetermined accordingly. Any amount found to be due to the taxpayer upon the basis of such redetermination shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 252. If such net loss is in excess of the net income for such preceding taxable year the amount of such excess shall under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, be allowed as a deduction in computing the net income for the succeeding taxable year.

(d) The benefit of this section shall be allowed to the members of a partnership and the beneficiaries of an estate or trust under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator two or three questions concerning section 204.

First, I should like to ask the Senator's definition, referring to subdivision (2) of section 204, permitting the deduction or the regarding as a loss of a "bona fide sale by the taxpayer of plant, buildings, machinery, equipment, or other facilities, constructed, installed, or acquired by the taxpayer on or after April 6, 1917, for the production of articles contributing to the prosecution of the present war." What definition does the Senator give to "the production of articles contributing to the prosecution of the present war"?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this has particular reference to concerns that have been induced by the Government of the United States either to increase or in many cases to establish a business for the production of goods for the Government, and they must be articles contributing to the prosecution of the present war.

Mr. LENROOT. But it is not limited in any way to articles produced for the Government, is it? And does not the Senator think it ought to be so limited—that is, to articles used by the Government? They might not be contributed or furnished directly to the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. I think this provision can not be abused in any way, even though those words are not incorporated in it. It applies only to institutions that have been established since April 6, 1917, the date of the declaration of war; and I know of no case, nor has there been presented to the committee a single, solitary case in which an institution has been, since the declaration of war, established for the purpose of manufacturing goods contributing to the war, other than goods that have been sold to the Government of the United States and to the allies. I think there should be no discrimination between goods sold to the allies and goods sold to our Government, and it is only such classes of goods that could possibly be sold to one or the other of these agencies.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true. I may say to the Senator that I do not think there has been any large establishment of business since that date that has not contributed to the war; but this language is most vague and indefinite, and, if there have been such, there are very few industrial plants in this country that might not be said in their output to have contributed to the prosecution of the war.

I more particularly wanted to ask the Senator, however, one or two questions with reference to subdivisions (b) and (c). As I understand the construction of these sections, if a taxpayer sustained a loss in 1917 he would be entitled to have that loss included as a deduction from his net income for the coming year.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. And if for any taxable year after January 1, 1919, a taxpayer sustains a net loss, he is entitled to have that loss included and treated as a deduction in his income tax for the preceding year, and to have that income tax redetermined upon the same basis as if the loss had been incurred for that taxable year.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a correct construction of the provision.

Mr. LENROOT. And if the loss was greater than the net income, so as to wipe out the tax entirely, under this language the entire tax that has been paid for the year 1918 must be refunded to the taxpayer for a loss incurred in 1919.

Mr. SMOOT. Such a thing could occur under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. LENROOT. And if the loss was greater than that, he is still entitled to have a deduction for the succeeding year.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct in the construction that he places upon this provision. I want to say to the Senator, in justification of the action of the committee in adopting this provision, that their idea was, in the case of this particular class of business, hazardous as it was, and the war coming to a close so quickly as it has, and the property being of very little value in some cases from now on, that a provision of this kind was really necessary in order that the manufacturers should—I will not say make money, but make themselves whole.

Mr. LENROOT. But I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this covers all ordinary business.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, all ordinary business established since the date of the declaration of war.

Mr. LENROOT. It covers all business, I will say.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. LENROOT. It is not limited to business incident to the prosecution of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is true. But I want to say to the Senator also in that connection that there is no question but that the business of the country has been paying taxes upon a rising market. They take stock at the end of one year at the value of the goods at that time, and at the end of another year they might not have made a single dollar upon the transaction of the business. Yet if they took their stock at the market price at that time it would show a handsome profit.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but that is fully taken care of——

Mr. SMOOT. That is taken care of in another provision. I am perfectly aware of that. It falls within the inventory section of this bill. But now that we have reached the very highest peak of cost, and from now it will be a descending scale, there is no provision in the inventory section to provide for the repayment of the losses that may incur, and this provision is to cover that very point, which is not covered in the relief provision of the inventory section.

I wish to say to the Senator that I know that this is a very sweeping provision, and the very reason why I am calling the attention of the Senate at this time to these relief provisions is that I want Senators to see them all together, so that they can judge what they are, and if there is any discussion, let us have it as a whole. I am not so much alarmed about what the bill provides as reported to the Senate as to its effect on the future business of the country; but what I am concerned about is how will the bill come out of conference?

Mr. LENROOT. But may I suggest to the Senator that while he suggests that the provision found upon page 29, taking care of losses occurring through inventories, does not provide for a refund, it could very easily be made to provide for it.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it could be made to, but it does not provide for it.

Mr. LENROOT. No. Now, I should like to ask the Senator this question:

I think we all realize the possibility—I will not say probability—of an industrial depression in the future, and possibly in the very near future. If the provisions of section 204, relating to net losses, should finally remain in the bill, we might easily have a situation where a very large percentage of the businesses and industries of this country might have net losses rather than net incomes. The result would be that we would have to refund the income taxes that they paid this year; and yet in all other methods of taxation the Government imposes taxes irrespective of whether there is a profit or a loss. I think it is entirely novel in the history of taxation anywhere, in passing a tax law, to treat three years as a unit of taxation instead of one. And that is what this amounts to, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, I must say that that is what the provision is really intended to cover. But I want to correct the Senator in saying that elsewhere there is no such tax provision known. It is true that there has never been such a provision provided in any law of the United States, but England has a provision very similar in her revenue laws, and she has found it absolutely necessary to prevent disaster to certain lines of business. As I stated, and I am perfectly frank in stating it, it is a broad sweeping provision, and if business should become unprofitable in the near future, if failures should become universal and there should be a stagnation in business in this country, the result would be just as the Senator has called attention to. But there seems to be an impression, and I think it is shared by business men generally, that it will take some time before conditions in Europe are such that they can get back to manufacturing goods for the world's commerce.

Another thing Europe is going to have her troubles the same as we will perhaps have ours in readjusting affairs and getting back into normal conditions. But the Senator no doubt knows my position on it, because I stated it this morning. I believe there is going to be a changed condition and there is going to be trouble in this country and in every other country before normal conditions arrive. But under this provision there will be very little refunding done. That is based wholly on the opinion I have that the year 1919 is not going to have the profit the year 1918 did by any manner of means, but it is going to be a fairly profitable year. If that is the case there will be very little to be refunded under the provision.

Mr. LENROOT. That would depend entirely upon industrial conditions?

Mr. SMOOT. No doubt.

Mr. LENROOT. May I put one other question to the Senator? The Government must have money to carry on the Government and meet its obligations. Can there be any justification, so long as that money must be raised, when profit has actually been realized, to pay back that profit out of a loss that wholly accrued in a subsequent year?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator if it had not been for the war such a provision as this would never have been thought of; it never would have been offered in the Senate; and it never would have been considered by the committee. The reason why it has been considered is because of the conditions that are brought about in certain industries on account of the immediate collapse of the war.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the Senator this question, then? Why was it not limited to losses occurring through these conditions rather than being made general? As we all know in the general run of business, under all ordinary peace conditions, some taxpayers will have a loss and other taxpayers will have a profit. Yet under these provisions we would refund to a taxpayer, who a year or two hence may sustain loss, the income tax that he properly paid this year.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that we should study the question carefully. It developed in the committee that not only contractors but small subcontractors were greatly affected by the sudden collapse of the war, and in many cases the subcontractors suffer the most. If we simply confine this to the man who held the contract for the furnishing of the materials to the Government or to our allies, it would not in many cases relieve the very ones who would suffer most. I am glad the Senator brought it up, and I am glad he called the attention of the country to it, because, as I stated before, it is a broad, sweeping provision, and I can not tell, and no soul on earth can tell, what effect it is going to have upon the revenues of the Government.

Now, as to amortization, first, vessels added to the list of facilities, for which allowances are made. The House limit of 25 per cent of net income is removed by the Senate committee amendment. If Senators will look at section 214, subdivision (a), paragraph 9, page 26, line 10, to page 27, line 16, and section 234, subsection (a), paragraph 8, page 56, line 5, to page 57, line 11, they will see the provision.

AMORTIZATION.

Vessels added to list of facilities for which allowance made. House limit of 25 per cent of net income removed from bill.

Section 214 (a) (9), page 26, line 10, page 27, line 16; section 234 (a) (8), page 56, line 5, page 57, line 11:

(9) In the case of buildings, machinery, equipment, or other facilities constructed, erected, installed, or acquired on or after April 6, 1917, for the production of articles contributing to the prosecution of the present war, and in the case of vessels constructed or acquired on or after such date for the transportation of articles or men contributing to the prosecution of the present war, there shall be allowed a reasonable deduction for the amortization of such part of the cost of such facilities or vessels as has been borne by the taxpayer, but not again including any amount otherwise allowed under this title of previous acts of Congress as a deduction in computing net income. At any time within three years after the termination of the present war the commissioner may, and at the request of the taxpayer shall, reexamine the return, and if he then finds as a result of an appraisal or from other evidence that the deduction originally allowed was incorrect, the taxes imposed by this title and by Title III for the year or years affected shall be redetermined; and the amount of tax due upon such redetermination, if any, shall be paid upon notice and demand by the collector, or the amount of tax overpaid, if any, shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 252.

INVESTED CAPITAL.

Section 326 (e) (4), page 100, lines 4 to 7, and page 101, lines 1 to 6, provides that the profits tax shall be determined on the basis of representative corporations (without regard to the invested capital of the taxpayer).

(e) Where the invested capital is materially disproportionate to the net income as compared with representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business because: * * *

4. Proper recognition or allowance can not be made for amortization, obsolescence, or exceptional depletion due to the present war, or to the necessity in connection with the present war of providing plant which will not be wanted for the purpose of the trade or business after the termination of the war.

Mr. LENROOT. In this connection can the Senator inform us as to the rules of the Treasury Department in ascertaining losses, whether or not in making such ascertainment they take into consideration and make an adjustment of the depreciation charges and amortization charges that may have been allowed the previous year?

Mr. SMOOT. They are all taken into consideration, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. In determining the net loss?

Mr. SMOOT. In determining the net loss for the calendar year 1919.

In this connection I may say to the Senate that the Government has made many contracts with concerns in this country for the furnishing of goods for the immediate prosecution of the war. It has also furnished most of the money for the erection of such plants and for the installation of machinery to run them. The contracts provided for certain amortization and the losses that could be deducted. In fact, in some cases, if the war had proceeded a couple more years, they would have made money, but under the conditions existing, with the collapse of the war, they have got to have a readjustment under the provisions of the contract, and I think that will be done. I am sure in many cases an investigation is under way at the present time for the purpose of determining the amount of the losses.

There is not much difference between this and the House provision, with the exception that they added to this "vessels" and also struck out the 25 per cent limitation provided for in the House. The Treasury Department appealed to the Committee on Finance that that limitation of 25 per cent be limited. They claim that they will not be abused, but in some cases, on account of the war coming to a sudden close, would leave the corporation and the Government in a very embarrassing position if the limit is retained. In fact, I believe that under the contracts made by the Government the individual could go into any court and claim his right under the contract, and a judgment would be rendered in his favor.

I called attention to the nonresident deduction as to property outside the United States found in section 214, subdivision (a), paragraph 3, page 25, lines 7 to 13, and the same thing in section 234, paragraph 8, subsection 3, page 55, lines 8 to 14, in which I alluded to deductions for the taxes imposed. I ask that it be incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NONRESIDENTS—DEDUCTIONS AS TO PROPERTY OUTSIDE UNITED STATES.

Section 214 (a) (3), page 25, lines 7–13 (and section 234 (a) (3), page 55, lines 8–14), allows a deduction of taxes imposed:

"(e) In the case of a nonresident alien individual, by the authority of any foreign country (except income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes, and taxes assessed against local benefits of a kind tending to increase the value of the property assessed), upon property or business, to the extent that the income from such property or business is subject to taxation under this title."

Section 214 (a) (8), page 26, lines 6–9 (and section 234 (a) (7), page 56, lines 1–4), remove the House limitations that depreciation can be allowed only as property of a nonresident within the United States.

"(8) A reasonable allowance for the depreciation of property used in the trade or business."

Mr. SMOOT. Next is the extension of time for filing the income-tax returns. House bill, section 227, subdivison (a), page 46, line 20, provides that no extension shall be for more than two months. This restriction has been removed. The reason for that is this: Two months was considered by the department to be an unnecessary limitation, and in a few cases it has been found that it was not a sufficient time. Therefore, the relief asked for by the department was granted.

The next has reference to the 6 per cent differential on undistributed profits, which I ask be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

SIX PER CENT DIFFERENTIAL ON UNDISTRIBUTED PROFITS.

House bill, section 230, page 47, imposed 18 per cent tax on income of corporation not distributed as dividends, or used in payment of indebtedness or purchase of liberty bonds. This differential has been removed and a flat 12 per cent tax imposed.

Following that is the cooperative societies; the deduction of amounts repaid to members. I am not going to take the time of the Senate but ask that it go in the RECORD showing the sections and the lines so that Senators can follow it very closely.

COOPERATIVE SOCIETIES—DEDUCTION OF AMOUNTS REPAID TO MEMBERS.

Section 231 (11), page 51, line 8, to page 52, line 3.

"The following organization shall be exempt from taxation under this title: * * *

"(11) Farmers', fruit growers', or like associations, or cooperative societies, organized and operated as sales agents for the purpose of marketing the products of members and turning back to them the proceeds of sales, less the necessary selling expense, on the basis of the quantity of produce furnished by them, or as purchasing agents for the purpose of supplying merchandise to members at cost, including the necessary expense: Provided, That associations or societies of the kind herein described but which also sell for or to nonmembers shall be liable to taxation under this Title but shall be allowed in addition to the deductions allowed in paragraphs (1) to (10), inclusive, of subdivision (a) of section 234 amounts paid during the taxable year to members on the basis of the quantity of products furnished by them representing the profits thereon, and (b) amounts repaid during the taxable year to members as discounts or rebates upon amounts paid by them for merchandise; but in no case shall the additional deductions authorized in this paragraph exceed the proportion of the total profits of the association or society which the amount of sales for or to members bears to the total amount of purchases or sales."

The next has reference to consolidated returns found in section 240, page 65, line 1; page 66, line 16. That is a subject matter that I think ought to be very carefully considered. It allows consolidated returns. Under existing law they are prohibited. It simply means that if a corporation desires to establish in 50 different places in the United States branch concerns, organized under the laws of the State in which they operate but owned by the same stockholders as the parent company, one return, a consolidated return, can be made for all such institutions. In other words, if the concern is located in New York City and makes a profit of 100 per cent upon its invested capital and it has another store in Iowa or in any other State in the Union and that institution loses $50,000 in its transaction of business during that same calendar year, then the parent institution can deduct the $50,000 loss made in the institution in Iowa from the credit of $100,000 profit made in the State of New York.

"CONSOLIDATED RETURNS.

"SEC. 240. (a) That corporations which are affiliated within the meaning of this section shall, under regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, make a consolidated return of net income and invested capital for the purposes of this title and Title III, and the taxes thereunder shall be computed and determined upon the basis of such return.

"In any case in which a tax is assessed upon the basis of a consolidated return the total tax shall be computed in the first instance as a unit, and shall then be assessed upon the respective affiliated corporations in such proportions as may be agreed upon among them, or, in the absence of any such agreement, then on the basis of the net income and invested capital properly assignable to each. There shall be allowed in computing the income tax only one specific credit of $2,000 (as provided in sec. 236); in computing the war-profits credit (as provided in sec. 311) only one specific exemption of $3,000; and in computing the excess-profits credit (as provided in sec. 312) only one specific exemption of $3,000.

"(b) For the purpose of this section, two or more corporations shall be deemed to be affiliated—

"(1) If one corporation owns directly or controls through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees substantially all the stock of the other or others, or if substantially all the stock of two or more corporations is owned or controlled by the same interests, or if one such corporation buys from or sells to another products or services at prices above or below the current market, thus effecting an artificial distribution of profits, or in any way so arranges its financial relationships with another corporation as to assign to it a disproportionate share of net income or invested capital.

"(2) A foreign corporation shall not be deemed to be affiliated with a domestic corporation unless substantially all its stock is owned or controlled by such domestic corporation or by a resident taxpayer or group of resident taxpayers owning or controlling substantially all the stock of such domestic corporation. Where under this subdivision a foreign corporation is affiliated with a domestic corporation, the total tax (computed as a unit as above provided) shall be reduced by the credit authorized in section 238."

The next has reference to installment payments. That simply means that there are four payment periods instead of three, as provided by the House. I ask that that be incorporated in the RECORD.

INSTALLMENT PAYMENTS—FOUR INSTEAD OF THREE.

Section 250 (a), page 69, line 20, and page 70, line 26:

"SEC. 250. (a) That except as otherwise provided in this section and sections 221 and 237 the tax shall be paid in four installments, each consisting of one-fourth of the total amount of the tax. The first installment shall be paid at the time fixed by law for filing the return, and the second installment shall be paid on the 15th day of the third month, the third installment on the 15th day of the sixth month, and the fourth installment on the 15th day of the ninth month, after the time fixed by law for filing the return. Where an extension of time for filing a return is granted the date of the expiration of the period of the extension shall be deemed to be the time fixed by law for filing the return. In any case in which the time for the payment of any installment is thus postponed because of an extension of time for filing the return there shall be added as part of such installment interest thereon at the rate of ½ of 1 per cent per month from the time it would have been due if no extension had been granted until paid. If any installment is not paid when due the whole amount of the tax unpaid shall become due and payable upon notice and demand by the collector.

"The tax may, at the option of the taxpayer, be paid in a single payment instead of in installments, in which case the total amount shall be paid on or before the time fixed by law for filing the return, and in the case of any tax of not over $200 so paid there shall be allowed a discount of 1 per cent of the amount thereof. Where an extension of time for filing the return has been granted no interest shall be added to the tax if the whole amount of the tax is paid on or before the time the third installment would have been due if no extension had been granted."

The refunds and credits in section 252, page 76, lines 4 to 24, I ask to have incorporated:

REFUNDS AND CREDITS.

Section 252, page 76, lines 4–24:

"REFUNDS.

"SEC. 252. That if, upon examination of any return of income made pursuant to this act, the act of August 5, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' the act of October 3, 1913, entitled 'An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,' the revenue act of 1916, as amended, or the revenue act of 1917, it appears that an amount of income, war profits or excess-profits tax has been paid in excess of that properly due, then, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3228 of the Revised Statutes, the amount of the excess shall be credited against any income, war profits or excess-profits taxes, or installment thereof, then due from the taxpayer under any other return, and any balance of such excess shall be immediately refunded to the taxpayer: Provided, That no such credit or refund shall be allowed or made after five years from the date when the return was due, unless before the expiration of such five years a claim therefor is filed by the taxpayer."

As to invested capital I call attention to the fact that tangible property under the relief provisions is allowed to its full value if clearly in excess of the par value of stock paid therefor. It is section 326, subdivision (a), paragraph 2, page 95, lines 1 to 9:

INVESTED CAPITAL.

Tangible property allowed to full value if clearly in excess of par value of stock paid therefor.

Section 326 (a) (2), page 95, lines 1–9:

"(2) Actual cash value of tangible property, other than cash, bona fide paid in for stock or shares, at the time of such payment, but in no case to exceed the par value of the original stock or shares specifically issued therefor, unless the actual cash value of such tangible property at the time paid in is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner to have been clearly and substantially in excess of such par value, in which case such excess shall be treated as paid-in surplus";

Then, again, in that same section, as to intangible property paid in prior to March 3, 1917, the House provided an aggregate of 20 per cent of the par value of the total stock or shares of the corporation outstanding on March 3, 1917. That was changed by an amendment in the Senate committee allowing 30 per cent.

Intangible property paid in prior to March 3, 1917, 30 per cent instead of 20 per cent.

Section 326 (a) (4), page 95, lines 15–21:

"(4) Intangible property bona fide paid in for stock or shares prior to March 3, 1917, in an amount not exceeding (a) the actual cash value of such property at the time paid in, (b) the par value of the stock or shares issued therefor, or (c) in the aggregate 30 per cent of the par value of the total stock or shares of the corporation outstanding on March 3, 1917, whichever is lowest."

Again, as to intangible property paid in for stock since March 3, 1917, there is the same change; that is, an allowance of 30 per cent instead of 20 per cent, as limited by the House. I ask that the following also be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Intangible property paid in for stock since March 3, 1917, 30 per cent instead of 20 per cent; House bill limited to patents and copyrights.

Section 326 (a) (5), page 95, line 22; page 96, line 4:

"(5) Intangible property bona fide paid in for stock or shares on or before March 3, 1917, in an amount not exceeding (a) the actual cash value of such property at the time paid in, (b) the par value of the stock or shares issued therefor, or (c) in the aggregate 30 per cent of the par value of the total stock or shares of the corporation outstanding at the beginning of the taxable year, whichever is lowest."

Tax determined on basis of representative concerns, without regard to invested capital of taxpayer—so-called "relief provisions."

Sections 327–328, page 99, line 9; page 101, line 20:

"That in the following cases the tax shall be determined as provided in section 328:

"(a) Where the commissioner is unable satisfactorily to determine the invested capital as provided in section 326;

"(b) In the case of a foreign corporation;

"(c) Where a mixed aggregate of tangible property and intangible property has been paid in for stock or for stock and bonds and the commissioner is unable satisfactorily to determine the respective values of the several classes of property at the time of payment, or to distinguish the classes of property paid in for stock and for bonds, respectively;

"(d) Where, as compared with representative corporations, engaged in a like or similar trade or business, the taxpayer would (under sec. 326) be placed in a position of substantial inequality, because of the time or manner of organization, or because the actual value of the assets on March 1, 1913, was substantially in excess of the amount at which such assets would be valued for the purpose of computing invested capital under the provisions of section 326;

"(e) Where the invested capital is materially disproportionate to the net income as compared with representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business because:

"1. The capital employed, although a material income-producing factor, is very small or is in large part borrowed;

"2. There are excluded from the invested capital as computed under the provisions of section 326, intangible assets of recognized and substantial value built up or developed by the taxpayer;

"3. The net income for the taxable year is abnormally high, due to the realization in one year of (a) gains, profits, or income earned or accrued during a period of years or (b) extraordinary gains or profit derived from the sale of property the principal value of which has been demonstrated by prospecting or exploration and discovery work done by the taxpayer. When the tax is determined under this paragraph proper allowance shall be made for the taxes which would have been payable in prior years if the gains, profits, or income earned or accrued in such years had been taxed at the rates then applicable;

"4. Proper recognition or allowance can not be made for amortization, obsolescence, or exceptional depletion due to the present war, or to the necessity in connection with the present war of providing plant which will not be wanted for the purpose of the trade or business after the termination of the war.

"SEC. 328. (a) In the cases specified in section 327 the tax shall be the amount which bears the same ratio to the net income of the taxpayer (in excess of the specific exemption of $3,000) for the taxable year, as the average tax of representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business, bears to their average net income (in excess of the specific exemption of $3,000) for such year. In such cases the commissioner shall compare the taxpayer only with representative corporations whose invested capital can be satisfactorily determined under section 326 and which are, as nearly as may be, similarly circumstanced with respect to gross income, net income, profits per unit of business transacted and capital employed, the amount and rate of war profits or excess profits, and all other relevant facts and circumstances."

Section 302, page 85, line 16; page 86, line 10:

"SEC. 302. That the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section 301 shall in no case be more than 30 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $3,000 and not in excess of $20,000, plus 80 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $20,000; and the tax imposed by subdivision (b) of section 301 shall in no case be more than 20 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $3,000 and not in excess of $20,000, plus 40 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $20,000. Nothing in this section shall be construed in such manner as to increase the tax imposed by section 301.

NEW CORPORATIONS—WAR-PROFITS CREDIT.

House bill (sec. 311 (b), p. 89, line 20; p. 90, line 3) limited new corporations to a deduction of 10 per cent of invested capital. The committee proposes the following provision (sec. 311 (c), p. 90, lines 4–24):

"(c) If the corporation was not in existence during the whole of at least one calendar year during the prewar period, then the war-profits credit shall be the sum of:

"(1) A specific exemption of $3,000; and

"(2) An amount equal to the same percentage of the invested capital of the taxpayer for the taxable year as the average percentage of net income to invested capital, for the prewar period, of corporation engaged in a trade or business of the same general class as that conducted by the taxpayer; but such amount shall in no case be less than 10 per cent of the invested capital of the taxpayer for the taxable year. Such average percentage shall be determined by the commissioner on the basis of data contained in returns made under Title II of the revenue act of 1917, and the average known as the median shall be used. If such average percentage has not been determined and published at least 30 days prior to the time when the return of the taxpayer is due, then for purposes of such return 10 per cent shall be used in lieu thereof; but such average percentage when determined shall be used for the purposes of section 250 in determining the correct amount of the tax."

INVESTED CAPITAL.

Section 327 (d), page 99, lines 20–24, provides that the profits tax shall be determined on the basis of representative corporations (without regard to the invested capital of the taxpayer):

"(d) Where, as compared with representative corporations, engaged in a like or similar trade or business, the taxpayer would (under sec. 326) be placed in a position of substantial inequality, because of the time or manner of organization."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, those are the relief provisions as provided in the bill. Some of them are very sweeping in their scope, and if not administered by the department in absolute fairness will work an unjust discrimination against the businesses of the country. I want Senators to know that in these provisions there is placed in the hands of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or the Secretary of the Treasury, as the case may be, a power that has never been granted to department officials before. If exercised wisely it will be a relief to the institutions of the country, and many of them will need it, but if exercised unjustly or unwisely there will be a frightful discrimination between business concerns and industries of the country.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. There was a great deal of complaint of the revenue bill passed a year ago because of the lack of flexibility. It was said that some of its provisions were too rigid and an appeal was directly made to the British system, which provided a practicable method of determining and adjusting those inequalities which necessarily arise. I presume the Senator now is calling attention to a feature of the bill that is somewhat along the English line, and if we administer it as England has administered hers there can be no objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. My colleague is correct in the deduction drawn. I want to say this to the Senate: I prefer a thousand times that Congress say how far the Commissioner of Internal Revenue can go in granting relief than the way it was accomplished under the present law. We passed the 1917 revenue bill, and I said during the discussion of it that it was impossible of administration. What happened? The Secretary of the Treasury appointed a commission to work with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the purpose of trying to arrive at what Congress meant by certain provisions of the law, and it took 287 pages of closely printed matter to cover the interpretations of the different provisions of the act and as a basis for administration.

The law was administered not as it passed Congress but as it was interpreted by this commission.

Mr. President, I do not think it is going to take very long to pass this bill through the Senate, but I think it is going to take quite a while for the conference to agree to its provision. I feel apprehensive as to what the bill will contain when agreed to in conference. I know what a just tax bill means to the people of this country, and in whatever we pass and whatever taxes we impose upon the American people let us as Members of the Senate work to the end that no discrimination shall be made. If we do that, Mr. President, and it takes the larger part of the profits of the business of the country to meet the obligations of the Government, I know there will not be a tithe of the complaint that there will be if the provisions of the House bill are enacted into law with all its discriminatory provisions.

Mr. President, I do not care at this time to discuss the other provisions of the bill. I shall content myself when amendments are reached to discuss them briefly, confining what I have to say to the subject when it is before the Senate for consideration and disposition.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). The Senator from Colorado suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Jones, Wash.	New	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Kendrick	Norris	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Kenyon	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Curtis	King	Overman	Smoot

Hitchcock	Martin, Ky.	Shafroth	Underwood
Johnson, Cal.	Moses	Sheppard	Walsh
Johnson, S. Dak.	Mulkey	Simmons	Warren
Jones, N. Mex.	Myers	Smith, Ariz.	Watson

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the Secretary begin the reading of the amendments which have been passed over. I think the first amendment passed over was on page 7. That amendment was passed over upon my statement that the Finance Committee wished further to consider that section and would probably later offer a substitute amendment for it. A meeting of the committee has not yet been held, and I ask that that amendment again go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will go over, as requested. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment which has been passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over, at the request of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], was on page 8, from line 10 to line 13, inclusive.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] does not seem to be in his seat just at this moment. I also requested that that paragraph go over. I have offered an amendment to it, which I hope the Senator having the bill in charge will accept. I send the amendment to the Secretary's desk and ask to have it read.

Mr. SIMMONS. To what section is the amendment proposed?

Mr. GRONNA. It is proposed to section 203.

Mr. PENROSE. Let the amendment be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8 it is proposed to amend section 203 by inserting a new subdivision, as follows:

In case the articles dealt in and inventoried by the taxpayer are of a kind whose cost has substantially increased since the close of the prewar period as defined in Title III of this act, the taxpayer may reduce the amount of the inventory, determined in accordance with the foregoing provisions, by a deduction of not more than 20 per cent, and in the event of such deduction the taxpayer shall with his return, under the provisions of this act, give a bond to the United States in such form and in such amount and with such surety or sureties as may be approved by the commissioner, conditioned that if, during the next succeeding taxable year, the cost of such like article shall not have declined to the full amount of such deduction the taxpayer shall pay an additional tax, determined in accordance with the provisions of this act, on the excess of such deduction over said decline in cost.

Mr. GRONNA. In support of this amendment I wish to have read, for the information of the Senate, a letter which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

GRAND FORKS, N. DAK., November 30, 1918.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our attention has been called to section 202 of H. R. 12863, fixing the basis of values for determining the amount of income and excess-profits taxes to be levied under the proposed new revenue law. We wish to appeal to you not only in our own behalf, but in behalf of the general public and thousands of small country merchants as well. We feel the basis of value outlined under this section is unfair, and wish to present a few points that appeal to us as worthy of consideration.

It is well known that merchandise values at the present time are on a war basis and are very high. The United States entered the world war on a basis of high prices, brought about by foreign buying, and since our entrance prices in nearly every line have still further increased. Our merchants did not enter the war period with large stocks, and most of the stocks now on hand were bought at the present high prices.

To compel the merchants of the Northwest to pay income and excess-profits taxes on these values in the face of postwar conditions which, it is reasonable to assume, will bring prices down, will be unfair and may cause great hardship. Credit is a large factor in our business in the Northwest, and it will be one of the first things to be affected.

We understand amendments have been proposed or will be proposed which will afford some relief. We believe it would be only fair to allow a flat reduction on present values, but if that is not possible we feel some relief at least is afforded by the suggested amendment outlined on the accompanying sheet.

The big merchant of the cities is not the only one to be affected by this proposed basis of valuation. We have in the Northwest, and particularly in Minnesota, North Dakota, and Montana, hundreds of cooperative stores and local mercantile companies, all or most of whose stockholders are farmers and local people. If these companies are compelled to pay taxes on the present high values and at the same time face an almost certain fall in the selling value of their goods, it will seriously affect the solvency of many of them.

The retail merchant in all lines has passed through very difficult and trying times because of the increase in merchandise prices. Increased costs, taxes, wages, rents, fuel, etc., necessarily mean higher prices to the consumer. The public is demanding a return to normal prices. The local merchants only ask that the change may be made without driving them into bankruptcy. Merchandise values can not come down in the face of heavy taxation.

If it is the purpose of the proposed bill to hit the big mercantile organizations of the country, we believe it undesirable to undertake it by means that will work hardship on the public and the small local merchants and his cooperative associates in business. The big fellows can to a certain extent control the markets in their present state and protect themselves until they can return to a lower level of prices without loss.

We believe the local merchants and local company stores of the Northwest are essential factors in our present economic life and the further development of the Northwestern States. They are not only sellers of merchandise, but they are also buyers of miscellaneous farm products. We submit that the local merchants has done as much or more than any other agency to encourage general farm activities. In this State grain can be marked at almost any siding, but the big butter, egg, and cream market is furnished by the hundreds of country stores. They have stood by their people through thick and thin, using their credit to tide their communities over periods of short crops and in other trials. Hundreds of the post offices of this and the surrounding States could not be maintained except as it is possible to secure some local merchants to handle them. We feel the merchants as a class are essential and speak for all as well as ourselves.

This matter has been before our general organization and our directors. In the absence of any other definite proposal we approve the amendment submitted herewith and ask your support of it or any other change in this measure that will make it possible for the local merchants of the Northwest to face the future safely.

Yours, truly,

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF GRAND FORKS AND EAST GRAND FORKS.
By FRANCIS MCKERNAN, Acting Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I realize that to some extent the matter referred to has been taken care of by the committee. I wish, however, to ask that the amendment may go over in order that I may confer with the chairman of the committee and other members of the committee in reference to it. It is possible that the amendment which has been proposed by the committee will be satisfactory, but I have not had an opportunity to make such an investigation as I should like to make in reference to it. I therefore ask that the amendment may again go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from North Dakota that the substance of the amendment which he has offered was presented to the Committee on Finance by certain corporations early in its deliberations, and their representatives argued very strongly in favor of it. It is, in substance, a proposition to set up a reserve to be utilized in case losses shall afterwards be sustained. The committee realized, and the department realized, that it was necessary to make some adequate provision with reference to possible losses in the very uncertain conditions in which we find ourselves. The matter was taken up with the experts of the department; it was discussed with them; the committee gave it the most thorough investigation, and decided that the method which we have adopted, as written in the bill, for meeting the situation was very much better than the proposal of the corporations. I had supposed that the amendments which we have made in order to meet this identical situation were entirely satisfactory to the business interests of the country.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand, section 203 of the bill is now under consideration?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I asked the other day that that section go over.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the inventory portion of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I asked that it go over, because I had received quite a number of telegrams, letters, and petitions from merchants and commercial organizations in my State suggesting a change in it. I was not in the Chamber at the moment the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] was read, but I hold in my hand an amendment which has been suggested to me, and I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if the plan it embodies has been considered by the committee. I assume from what he has stated that it has been. This proposition is to add to the section the words, "a reasonable allowance being made for the increased cost of merchandise so inventoried over the average cost of like merchandise during the prewar period."

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that thought, I think, is covered by one of the amendments which we have made, though not exactly in that language.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from North Carolina has stated that the amendment proposed by the committee really covers that suggestion?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I have.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And that is the view of the representatives of the department?

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me read to the Senator one of the amendments proposed by the committee. There are two amendments with reference to this matter. The amendment with reference to net loss has some bearing upon it, but I have not thought that was sufficiently sweeping to meet the situation because it applies only to a case where there is a net loss. There are many cases where relief is needed where there is no net loss. The great majority of cases will be of that character. We adopted this amendment to meet this situation:

(12) If it is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner that during the taxable year 1919 or 1920—

That is the time the injury will result if any does occur—

the taxpayer (a) has for the first time ascertained the amount of a loss sustained during the preceding taxable year and not deducted from the gross income therefor, or (b) has sustained a substantial loss (whether or not actually realized by sale or other disposition), resulting from any material reduction (not due to temporary fluctuation) of the value of the inventory for the preceding taxable year, then the amount of such loss shall be deducted from the net income for such preceding taxable year, and the taxes imposed by this title and by Title III for such year shall be redetermined accordingly. Any amount found to be due to the taxpayer upon the basis of such redetermination shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 252.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That seems to me to pretty well cover the proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. The gentlemen who came before the committee when the war was about to terminate said, "If the war shall suddenly end we are confronted with a very serious situation. Our income for the previous year has been based upon our inventories taken at the close of that year. Those inventories were based upon the high prices paid for the commodities in stock." Basing their income upon the value of the stock at the end of the year, they had a large net profit; but they said, "That may be nothing more than a paper profit; we have not sold the goods; they have simply been estimated for the purpose of ascertaining what has been our profit. Now, if there suddenly comes a termination of the war and the value of these inventoried articles shrinks, instead of having a profit, the profit which it was estimated we had in the previous year, we shall have a loss, because we will not be able to sell those goods until after the decline comes." To meet that situation we said that if it were discovered as the result of the decline in prices of the articles covered by the inventory that they had sustained a loss, or would have sustained a loss if the value of those goods had been estimated at the price at which they would have to sell them, they should be allowed to recoup themselves in the method provided by this amendment. I myself think it is very complete.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the chairman of the committee if under the amendment proposed by the committee a merchant would be authorized to make the inventory according to the market value and not according to the cost of the goods?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; for the purposes of the reduction he would be permitted to correct his inventory of the previous year according to the basis of the prices to which his goods had fallen.

Mr. GRONNA. In that case would not a merchant be compelled to pay the tax just the same, unless he is authorized to make the inventory based upon the market value and not upon the cost?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; in that case the amendment provides that his income for the previous year shall be redetermined; and in redetermining it his assets are to be valued as of the basis to which they have fallen as a result of the shrinkage in value, thereby showing a less income than that upon which he has already paid a tax. Now, he is recouped for that out of his income tax for the next year.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. As I gathered the question of the Senator from North Dakota, his question was whether in this instance the merchant would be permitted in making his inventory to make it according to market value rather than according to cost?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; his first inventory is made according to market value.

Mr. LENROOT. Or according to the cost, as the case may be.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; or according to cost, as the case may be.

Mr. GRONNA. If that is the case——

Mr. SIMMONS. According to the market value at that time; but if, before those goods are sold, the market value shrinks and as a result of that shrinkage he makes a loss because he had valued them too high, then he is entitled to be recouped out of his next assessment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what he means by the use of the expression "makes a loss"? Does he mean that the provision only applies to such cases where a merchant sells his goods below cost?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I merely want to know what the fact is.

Mr. SIMMONS. It occurs in this way: In ascertaining his net profit a merchant has to take an inventory at the end of the year of all of his assets, there having been an inventory at the beginning of the year. He ascertains what his profits are upon the basis of that inventory. Now, if the assets have been given a fictitious value by reason of conditions, as a result of that high valuation his income may appear to be large, but he may sustain a loss because of his inability to sell the goods that were in stock at the time at the price at which they were inventoried.

The Senator will see this situation might arise: In taking that inventory at the peak prices that obtained just before the close of the war, a large profit might have been shown, but the war ends the next day, prices slump from 25 to 30 per cent, and that paper value upon which his profits were estimated has disappeared; it has gone.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And he has suffered a loss?

Mr. SIMMONS. He has suffered a loss as a result. The profit was a war profit; it was not an actual profit shown from the result of the actual sale of the articles, but it was a profit resulting from an abnormal price that was placed upon them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the merchant now has actually incurred a loss?

Mr. SIMMONS. He has actually incurred a loss.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood that was the statement of the Senator. I want to put another case: Suppose at the end of the year an inventory is taken, and the profit upon the year's transaction appears to be, say, $50,000 upon the inventory of the goods at the then market value. Now, suppose during the year, instead of selling those goods at the then market value, he is compelled to sell them at a value which reduces his nominal profits of the previous year, upon which he has paid his tax, from $50,000 down to $25,000. He has suffered no loss, but his profits are only one-half as much as the profits upon which he has paid taxes. Has he any recourse against the Government?

Mr. SIMMONS. He has lost as a result of the shrinkage in value of the goods upon which his profits were estimated.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He has made a profit upon the year's business, but he has made a profit only one-half as large as that upon which he has paid taxes. Can he recoup from the Government, so that his net payment of taxes shall only be equal to his exact profits?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that is what the amendment of the committee means.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But it does not say so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that I have completely understood the Senator, and I do not know that the Senator has completely understood me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, yes; I understood the Senator perfectly. He took the position that where a merchant at the end of the year had made up his inventory and showed a certain profit and paid a tax upon that profit and afterwards sold his goods at a loss he could then recoup himself from the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the Senator also emphasized the fact that he must have sold them at a loss. I am putting a case—and it will be far the most numerous class of cases, I am sure—in which a merchant has paid his tax upon a certain profit and there has been such a shrinkage in the market value of the goods in actual sale that, instead of making, say, a profit of $50,000, he only made a profit of $25,000, but meanwhile has paid taxes on the full $50,000; and I put it to the Senator, has the merchant any right to recover that excessive tax which he has paid?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the amendment provides that that shall be deducted from his income of the previous year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I correct the Senator?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. First, I will call the Senator's attention to pages 29 and 60 of the bill, in which the provisions referred to by the Senator from North Carolina are found.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have them here.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no deduction unless there is an actual loss, not a loss as between a profit of $25,000 and a profit of $50,000, for there is no provision whereby there will be a credit of the difference in that case; but if there is a loss of $25,000, then the provisions to which I have referred do allow the taxpayer to recover.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is talking about net losses.

Mr. SMOOT. I am talking about the question asked by the Senator from Nebraska. The Senator from Nebraska stated the case in this way, that if the merchant had made $50,000, or if a concern had made $50,000 and then afterwards found that there was a reduction in the selling price of the goods, so that his profit was only $25,000, would he be repaid by the Government for the tax paid upon that difference of $25,000? No; he would not be, because he has suffered no loss; but if he had made $50,000 and in the readjustment of the prices of his merchandise had lost $50,000 and $25,000 more, then the Government, of course, would give him credit for the tax upon the $25,000; but no credit would be allowed unless there was an actual loss.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not agree with the Senator from Utah at all in his statement. I agree that that is a correct interpretation of what we call the net-loss amendment, but this is a different matter altogether.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, let me put another question to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. This is a matter that provides for shrinkage in the inventory value.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes. Now, can the Senator point out in the bill any provision which reimburses a merchant who has paid taxes upon a certain paper profit and it turns out during the year that that paper profit is only half as large as he had estimated it would be?

Mr. SIMMONS. Was the Senator here when I read the amendment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but I do not interpret it as the Senator interprets it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, let me read it to the Senator again. It is as follows:

(12) If it is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner that during the taxable year 1919 or 1920 the taxpayer (a) has for the first time ascertained the amount of a loss sustained during the preceding taxable year and not deducted from the gross income therefor, or (b) has sustained a substantial loss (whether or not actually realized by sale or other disposition), resulting from any material reduction (not due to temporary fluctuation) of the value of the inventory for the preceding taxable year, then the amount of such loss shall be deducted from the net income for such preceding taxable year, and the taxes imposed by this title and by Title III for such year shall be redetermined accordingly. Any amount found to be due to the taxpayer upon the basis of such redetermination shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 252.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not think that covers the situation at all. That is the case of a man, say, in the wholesale dry-goods business, who has made his report of certain profits on the basis of his inventory, and he finds later on that whereas he estimated a profit of, say, $5,000 on his calicoes, he has actually sold his calicoes at a loss instead of at a profit. There was an actual loss incurred. But I am talking about a case in which, by a man's inventory, he has reported to the Government a paper profit of a certain amount, and by actual experience during the next 12 months in selling his goods he finds that instead of having had a paper profit of a certain amount, upon which he has paid taxes, his profit actually has been one-half of what he had estimated, and therefore he has paid twice as much in taxes as he should have paid.

Mr. SIMMONS. What occurs in that case is simply to authorize a redetermination of his taxes for the previous year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Senator point out where that comes in? I am not able to find it.

Mr. SIMMONS. It appears in the very language that has been read. I do not think I can express it any more strongly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; that section provides that where the merchant has incurred a loss instead of a profit on the sale of his goods he can recoup; but there is no provision there which enables him to recoup when he has sold his goods at one-half as much profit as he has paid taxes on.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, the matter of whether or not he has sustained a loss must be determined from his books.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but it seems to me——

Mr. SIMMONS. His books show that his assets—his merchandise, so to speak—were estimated as of a certain market value. That was the correct market value as of that date. But the next month there is a certain slump, and those goods which are still on hand and undisposed of are subject to a very sudden and marked reduction in price, and they have to be sold upon the basis of this lower level of prices. Now, as a result of that, he has sustained a loss——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. In the sense that he has had to pay an income tax estimated upon those goods at a certain price.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, I think the Senator is entirely mistaken. That merchant has incurred no loss. His profits have simply been cut down, and you have provided no way for him to get relief.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think he ought to have any relief.

Mr. SIMMONS. I admit that he has not sustained a loss in the sense——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to request Senators to address the Chair before interrupting the debate.

Mr. PENROSE. And to speak one at a time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I admit that he has incurred no loss in the sense, probably, that the Senator is using, but the loss that is referred to is the loss that he has sustained by having to pay a higher income tax because of a fictitious estimate as to the value of his assets.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me ask the Senator another question.

Mr. SIMMONS. For instance, if the Senator will let me elaborate, suppose that in taking the inventory for the purpose of estimating the annual profits the goods had been valued at $50,000 upon the high level of prices then obtaining, and that would show a profit, we will say, of $25,000. Now the slump comes, and these goods are still on hand, and they are sold for, say, $40,000. Now, my understanding is that while he has sustained no actual loss, he has paid an income tax upon a $50,000 basis of profit, whereas he should have paid an income tax upon a $40,000 basis of profit, and the income taxes are to be redetermined in the light of this disclosure as to the unreal condition of the prices that obtained at the time.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. HITCHCOCK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Nebraska has been interrogating me, and I had yielded to him.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I agree with the Senator that that should be the purport of the bill. The Government certainly does not intend to collect from any merchant a tax upon a profit which he does not actually make. The profit necessarily has to be estimated by the inventory at the close of the year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, if the inventory, as is probable, turns out to be excessive, he ought to be able to recover back the amount which he has paid in excess of what he should have paid.

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But it seems to me that the bill as drawn only provides that there shall be a rebate when a merchant incurs a loss and does not provide for making a rebate where he has paid an excessive tax. Now, it seems to me that this should be made clear, if that is the purpose of the Senator. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says that that is not the purpose. The chairman of the committee says it is the purpose; but, whatever it is, it ought to be made clear in the bill, and it ought not to be left to be a subject for dispute and doubt. The merchants ought to know "where they are at."

Mr. LENROOT. I think it is very clear, indeed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether it is his view that a taxpayer is compelled in his inventory to inventory his goods at the market value if that market value be in excess of the cost?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I think not.

Mr. LENROOT. So that if the cost is greater than the market value the inventory is at cost, and therefore there is an actual loss thereafter resulting.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not quite understand the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The answer that the Senator gives to the Senator from North Dakota, that the inventory must be taken at the market price, under the provisions of section 203——

Mr. SIMMONS. It must be taken at the market price or at cost, whichever is lower.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, that is entirely a different proposition. I agree with the Senator. That is the accounting practice of all business concerns; you must take it at the price that is the lowest. If the cost is lower you take it at cost. If the market price is lower you take it at the market price.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will yield, I misspoke a moment ago. When I said that there must be a loss I meant, of course, that if there was a sale at less than the inventory price there must have been an actual loss.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it seems to me that is a matter of large importance, and it is evidently so doubtful in meaning that members of the committee disagree over it. Certainly the committee intends that where the falling market has resulted in imposing an actual loss upon the taxpayer, he shall be relieved by having it rebated to him later on. Now, it seems to me that the committee ought also to mean that where the merchant has paid a tax which is demonstrated by a falling market to be larger than it ought to be, he ought to be also able to recover that from the Government; and therefore the bill not only ought to provide for the reimbursement of merchants when it is found that by reason of the falling market they have incurred a loss, but it also ought to reimburse them when it has been demonstrated that by reason of a falling market the tax which they have paid is larger than it should have been. That does not seem to me to be provided in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska is through——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not anything further.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska that if his ideas were carried out in this bill nobody could tell what revenue we would receive. As far as I am concerned, I had no idea of any such proposition ever being written into this bill. I am perfectly willing—and that is what this amendment provides for, and I think it goes a long, long way—that where a business loses money on account of a decrease in the price of goods, as far as the tax upon the loss is concerned the Government shall refund. But if we go on and say here that the Government is to refund all of the tax—and, by the way, the tax will not be paid as stated by the Senator—if the following year we go to work and say that if goods then should fall 50 per cent, 50 per cent of the taxes that the merchant paid for the preceding year should be given back to him if he did not make a profit, then I can not tell what will become of our Treasury.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that terrible predicament can hardly prove to be possible. The inventory of the goods taken on the last day of December will be an inventory which will be out of date in less than 90 days. The goods must be sold within a very short time after the inventory is taken, so that any loss which the man may sustain, which the Government might have to reimburse him for, would be a loss which would have to accrue during 90 days following the inventory. Merchants do not have their goods on hand for a year.

Mr. SMOOT. Many of them would be kept on hand for more than a year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It would be perfectly proper to limit it to a reasonable length of time for marketing the goods; but the point is this: The inventory is a mere guess at profits. That is all it is. It is the only way of getting at it at the time. The actual test is what the goods sell for in the natural course of business in the weeks immediately following the inventory. In the average business the goods are turned over several times a year, and it would be perfectly proper to limit this deduction to what was proven to be necessary, say, during 90 days following the inventory.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's argument would be perfectly correct if the amendment that is presented here in section 203 were construed as I believe he construes it; that is, that the price is to be taken at inventory, whether it is higher or whether it is lower than the market price. Now, that is not the case. The lowest is to be taken, whether it is the market price or whether it is the cost when the inventory is taken, and therefore it can not be as the Senator says. Of course, there may be a loss in the year beginning January 1, even up to the end of the year 1919. There may be a gradual decrease in the sales, and on the goods that he has purchased and sold where there was no loss as compared with cost he may come out at the end of the year with a profit; he may have almost as much gain as he would have had if he had not been purchasing goods and had sold them all out, of all kinds and characters. The Senator is asking now that no matter if he does make a profit that year, if it can be shown from the amount of goods that were taken on his inventory on the last day of the year 1918 that there is a loss between that and any time within the year 1919, he shall be relieved of the tax that he paid on the business of the year before on the difference between cost and market price. Now, that can not be done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the answer to that is that whatever profit the merchant makes during the year 1919 he will pay a tax on out of the profits of that year; but we are talking now about taxing him for the year 1918, and we are estimating his profits, and we are assuming a case in which it is found that instead of making $50,000 profit, for which he has paid the Government a tax, his profits have been only half that much.

Mr. SMOOT. But the trouble is he has not, if he takes his inventory at the lowest market price. That must show just exactly what the profit is at that date.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If he has taken his inventory at the lowest market price, he would have that much less claim on the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But I am talking about where he has an actual claim for loss, where he has paid on a profit of $50,000 and it turns out that he has only made a profit of $25,000. Does the Senator think that he ought to pay as much tax as a man who has really made $50,000?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that when on December 31 of this year he takes his inventory of stock, under section 203 of this bill he must take it either at the market price or at the cost price; but he must take at whichever is the lower, and perhaps that will be the market price. Now, he pays his tax not upon the invoice price, if the market price is lower, but upon the market price; and therefore at that time he is not paying upon a paper profit at all. But now we come in with the relief provision, and we say that if during the business year 1919 there should be such a slump in the price of goods that he would be compelled to sell the goods at such a price that it would show an actual loss from his inventory of December 31, 1918, then he is entitled to a refund from the Government or to a credit upon his taxes. That is what we say.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me ask the Senator this question: The Senator proposes to reimburse that man if there is such a slump in the market value of the goods in his stock that he actually suffers a loss. Now, then, suppose the slump is not quite so much as that, and it only goes down to the point of wiping out all of his profits; would the Senator still claim that that man should pay the Government a tax on $50,000 of profits when he has made no profits at all?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly, Mr. President. Every man who goes into business takes all of the chances of business. There are thousands of them that do not make any profits at all at any time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is not the point. We understand that; but when a man does not make any profit we do not make him pay any tax. The Senator proposes to charge that man just as much tax on doing business without any profit at all as he would charge a man doing business, perhaps, in the same town, who has made $50,000 profit.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. When the corporation makes its return, it does not make a return showing any more profits than it has made, and those moneys have been distributed. If it is a corporation, more than likely they have been distributed; and, Senators, under this bill now they do not even have to distribute them. All the corporation would have to pay would be the 12 per cent normal tax; and let me say to the Senator that it does seem to me that the Government of the United States can not guarantee profits to any institution in this country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And yet you propose to do it by this bill. You are guaranteeing a man profits when you say that if he suffers a loss you will wipe out his tax.

Mr. SMOOT. But that is if it is a loss.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can not see any reason why you should give him a rebate in one case and not in the other.

Mr. SMOOT. But that is only a partial loss. This, however, is a refund. We say, "If you, through some unforeseen accident or some cause over which you have no control, have lost during the year half of what you ought to have made, of course you are entitled to take it off by exemption."

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; the Senator says, "If he has lost half of what he has made." If he loses all he has made, he is not entitled to get anything back. It is only when he makes an actual loss that he gets anything back.

Mr. SMOOT. What the Senator meant is that he is only taxed upon his net gains, not in any way, shape, or form as to gross gains, less certain exemptions that we give him under the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is bringing in other elements now; but he is in the illogical position of proposing to refund to a merchant who has paid taxes under a misapprehension if his business has been run at a loss, but not to refund taxes also paid when he has done business without any profit at all, and yet he has paid a tax upon an assumed profit. There is no more logic in one than in the other.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, he does not pay a tax upon an assumed profit.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question. Can the Senator from Utah inform the Senate what the practice of the Treasury Department is with reference to valuations of stocks of goods taken on inventories? That is the important question.

Mr. SMOOT. The practice will be this under the amendment offered to the House bill: If the market value is lower than the cost value, the market value will be taken. If the cost value is lower than the market value, the cost value will be taken.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from Utah that my amendment provides that the inventory shall be taken at the market value of the goods. It permits a reduction to the extent of 20 per cent. It does not permit a greater reduction than that in case the inventory proves to be an overvaluation. My amendment provides that instead of compelling a merchant, as is now the practice, to take the inventory based upon the cost or upon the purchase price, not the market value, the inventory shall be based upon the market or real value. Now, I think it is unfair to compel a merchant or anybody else to take an inventory of a stock based upon what he may have paid for it, when, as a matter of fact, it is worth much less in the market of that day.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if it is worth less than the cost price at the time the inventory is taken, he inventories it at a lower price.

Mr. GRONNA. It does not specifically say so in your bill. There is no provision for that in your bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think there is a provision that covers that.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me point out to the Senator from North Carolina and to the other members of the committee where, under my proposed amendment, the Government of the United States might collect more revenue than under your proposed amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARREN in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I will call the Senator's attention to one of many cases and show that there should not be the limitation of 20 per cent if we desire to do justice to all concerned.

Take a dry-goods house. It carries a line of cotton goods only, and during the prewar period its stock amounted at the inventory period to a million dollars. If that same concern, carrying the same amount of cotton goods to-day—no more yards, no more dozens, no more bolts, but just the same as was carried during the prewar period—took an inventory to-day, it would not show a million dollars, but it would show $3,000,000. Now, if the conditions were such that cotton goods would drop before December 31, 1919, 50 per cent, we will say——

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator is now speaking of prewar prices, of course. He is simply assuming that now?

Mr. SMOOT. I am stating the case exactly as it is. If they should drop 50 per cent from the price at which they are inventoried up to and including December 31, 1919, they would show then an increase in the prewar period prices of 50 per cent; and if there were no relief given in this bill in such a case, a concern of that kind, if such a thing as that should happen, could not exist. It would be impossible for them to pay the obligations that they had had to incur in order to carry $3,000,000 worth of stock instead of $1,500,000 worth.

Now, if the Senator's amendment is adopted, that would be limited to 20 per cent. Therefore, if that should happen—that is, if a decline of 50 per cent should happen between now and December 31, 1919—instead of receiving a credit on that $3,000,000 of $1,500,000, under the 20 per cent provision it would be only $600,000. That is the difference between the Senator's proposition and the proposition provided for in the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah, who is nearly always, except at this time, right, is supposing an impossible thing and something which never has or never will happen. I am proposing to do justice to those people who have a large amount of goods on hand, and who at the time of taking the inventory shall be permitted to reduce the price to the extent of 20 per cent. Any good merchant knows that never in the history of the country has any stock of goods in a short period of time been reduced below 20 per cent. I will say to the Senator it would be unjust not only to the merchant but to the public. How do you expect the merchant is going to reduce his price to the public when you are making it impossible for him to give a lower valuation in making his tax return?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the provisions of the amendment of the Senate committee, if he can show that there is a 20 per cent decline, he would be allowed it. If he can show more than a 20 per cent decline, he is allowed it. So all that is comprehended in the Senator's amendment is comprehended in the committee amendment, and in the committee amendment more, too, is comprehended.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not think so, Mr. President, I do not think that section 12 or the other section takes care of what I complain about. I do not believe that the merchant would be allowed to make his reduction when he takes the inventory for the reason that the department will insist that an inventory shall be taken based on the purchase price of the goods, and not the market value.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to interpret the amendment to mean that the merchant arbitrarily must take 20 per cent off the inventory price?

Mr. GRONNA. No.

Mr. SMOOT. There would be no justice in that——

Mr. GRONNA. I do not.

Mr. SMOOT. Because if the goods do not decline 20 per cent he should not be allowed to take off 20 per cent.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GRONNA. With pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS. I had during the time the bill was before the committee a large number of conferences with gentlemen representing the merchandising interests of the country, and who were here because of their special concern upon this subject of inventory. Their spokesman informed me just before the committee adopted this amendment that he thought it was a fairly satisfactory disposition of a very intricate subject, and that the interests which they represented here would be fully protected. I do not pretend to know as much about the intricacies of the subject as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] or the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], both of whom have given it much more consideration than myself, but the fact that it is substantially satisfactory to interests that are very deeply concerned in it makes me loath to disturb it. If the question is opened again, the same concessions which are asked for the merchandising business of the country will be insisted upon by other pursuits.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I had read at the desk a moment ago a letter from the merchants' association of my State, and I think it presented a very fair and just case. The Senator from Utah said that we might do an injustice to the merchants of the country by allowing them only 20 per cent. I think if I wanted to take the time of the Senate I could point out where there is a possibility, and not only a possibility but a probability, of collecting more taxes under my amendment than the amendment proposed by the committee.

As the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] said a moment ago, the first inventory will be taken for the purpose of determining the tax for the years 1918 and 1919. Let us suppose that the amendment reported by the committee will be interpreted as the Senator from Utah says it will be interpreted, that there will be a larger reduction made than 20 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that there would be.

Mr. GRONNA. What I am contending is that there would not be, but the Senator from Utah has argued all the time, if I understood him correctly, that it would be based upon the market price and not upon the price paid by the merchant.

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is where the Senator is mistaken. I contend that under the wording of the amendment in section 203 the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has no choice other than what the general practice is, and that practice——

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator state what the practice now is?

Mr. SMOOT. That practice is this: If the cost price is more than the market price, then the market price is to be taken. If the cost price is less than the market price, then the cost price is to be taken; or, in other words, the lowest of either the market or the cost price is always to be taken. That is the practice and that is the rule.

Mr. GRONNA. Even in that case, I will say to the Senator, there would be a less tax collected by the Government than in accordance with my amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The only way it could possibly be more would be this: In case there was a greater loss than 20 per cent then you are absolutely correct. Under your provision there would be collected more tax, but the Senator from Utah does not think that that is going to be, and he only brought it to the attention of the Senate as he did because it could happen in certain lines of goods.

Let me call the Senator's attention to a thing that came to my attention the other day. Take the item of tungsten. Suppose there is a dealer in tungsten who bought his goods before the signing of the armistice. At that time every unit of tungsten in the United States would have brought $24.50. Immediately upon the signing of the armistice it began to decline and to-day it is only $12 per unit, or a decline of over 50 per cent. I know that is one case, and there are other cases that I could call the Senator's attention to. Therefore if the man who had purchased his tungsten before the signing of the armistice would take his inventory on the 31st day of this month, we will say, under the amendment here he will take whatever the market price is, because that is the lowest. But if tungsten had advanced to $30 a unit then he would have taken the cost price under the provision here. The Senator can see that in that case if he were allowed only 20 per cent, under the provisions of this amendment he could never get what he was really entitled to receive.

Mr. GRONNA. If the amendment proposed by the committee will do what the Senator from Utah states it will do, what is the objection to saying in the bill that these people shall be permitted to take the inventory based upon the market value? What is the objection to that?

Mr. SMOOT. It may be in some cases an injustice and in another case it may be an advantage. It seems to me that they ought to have the privilege of taking the very lowest price. If they bought at a high price and the market value is lower, give them the market value, because they will have to go into the market and buy the goods again, and when they do that they should not be taxed more than the market price. On the other hand, if an article has risen for some unaccountable reason above the cost price of the goods they have on hand, why should he be granted that price in taking the inventory? Therefore the practice, I think, is perfectly correct to take only the lowest of the two, whichever it may be.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator that if the price of the goods has risen he should take the inventory based upon the value.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what he will do under this amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. And that will be the market price, will it not?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. GRONNA. According to the Senator's statement, your amendment is more liberal than the one I have proposed.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I say.

Mr. GRONNA. With that understanding I shall not further press my amendment and will withdraw it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it seems to me this provision of the bill ought to be reasonably well understood, and when understood it ought to appeal to the good judgment of the Senate. I must say the provision caused the members of the committee, and certainly myself, as much trouble as perhaps any other one in the bill. We recognized the situation which was presented from various points of view.

I will state, in the first place, that there was no unanimity of opinion as to what would occur immediately upon the cessation of the war with respect to prices. Some were rather of the opinion that prices would at once fall off very materially; others were of a contrary opinion; they said if prices were reduced at all, there would be a gradual reduction, and that it would extend over not one year but perhaps several years. So we could not assume any actual condition that would occur upon the cessation of the war.

Some suggested as a remedy that we permit a reserve to be retained in order to take care of prospective reductions in the inventory value, but nobody could tell how much that reduction should be. We did not know what was going to occur to prices, and so we put in this provision.

Here is the way it will operate, as I see it, and it seems to me it will appeal to the good judgment of the Senator from North Dakota. In all income-tax legislation there must necessarily be periods of calculation. In order to ascertain an income tax at all you must do it for some period of time. So in this bill we take a year. It may be the calendar year or it may be the fiscal year of the business enterprise of a corporation, but we take the period of a year. Now, then, this concern has been engaged in business for the year 1918. At the end of this year its business stands upon the conditions existing at that time, and, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has well said, under this provision of the bill you make your inventory upon this well-recognized rule of business concerns. At the end of the year you take either the cost price or the market value, whichever is the lowest. That gives the advantage of the situation to the business. The stock of goods on hand at that time is certainly worth the value which was carried into the inventory, and whatever appears upon the face of the business for the year is profit. That winds up the transaction for that year. The business is closed. It has made that profit, and on that profit it pays a tax to the Government. Now, then, the man decides on the 1st day of next January——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Just permit me a moment. He decides the 1st day of the next January whether or not he will continue his business. He begins a new business period. He takes those goods at that value. He charges himself with that stock of goods at that value; and the stock of goods is unquestionably worth that value, because it is ascertained in the way I have just stated. He begins business for the next period. He has full value for every dollar appearing upon his books. During the year there is a decline.

Mr. GRONNA. Before the Senator goes any further, will he yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. Allow me to make this statement. I have evidently not made myself plain. I do not think that the merchant or anyone should be permitted to ask for a price below the market value. I have not been pleading for any such thing as that. I believe it is only fair to the people of the country and to the Government that a fair market value should be placed upon every inventory, and that is all I have been pleading for.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, the Senator should be perfectly satisfied with this bill, because it at least does that. If the goods happen to have cost less than that, the merchant is permitted a still lower value.

Now, the business man proceeds in 1919. There may be a fall in values during 1919. If he conducts his business and at the end of the year makes no profit at all, he simply has failed to make a profit for the year 1919. That is the result of his business transactions for that year, and no remedy can or should be put into any law which would cover any other sort of a condition.

The condition presented by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] you could not write into a law; but if you could, you ought not to do it. It would simply mean, as I understood the Senator from Nebraska, that owing to the reduction in prices during the year 1919, if a part of that had occurred in 1918 the merchant's profit would have been less in 1918. You can not meet a contingency of that sort, and you do not want to do it.

You have got to have a definite period in which to calculate your income tax, and each year or tax period must stand upon its own bottom. But in liberality and in anticipation of some such illustration as the Senator from Utah has just given, we have gone to the extent of saying that if in the year 1919 you carry on your business and suffer an actual loss in the business, not only do not make any profit but suffer a loss, then out of the liberality of the legislation and for the purpose of meeting the extraordinary condition of things due to the war we say that you may take the amount of your net loss back into the year 1919 and have your taxes adjusted accordingly. I submit that is the fair thing to do. I believe when Senators study this situation they will come to the conclusion that the committee has done the very best they possibly could do in dealing with this most perplexing situation.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not quite understand the section as the Senator explains it. He has said that it permits the carrying back into the preceding year of the loss. I do not so understand the section. As I understand the section, the loss must actually have occurred during the preceding year, but not ascertained during that year. It seems to me that is the case where it would apply. It could not apply where the inventory was at the market value and the market value was less than the cost, but it could apply in cases where the inventory was at cost, although at that time the market value was less than cost. In that kind of a case the loss would have been sustained during the preceding year and the provision of the section would apply.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask the Senator if he has in mind paragraph (b) of section 204?

Mr. LENROOT. I take it that the words "sustained during the preceding taxable year" are carried into (b) because if it is a loss for the taxable year the provision of the bill already provides for that being put in as a reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. May I suggest to the Senator from New Mexico that his remarks had reference to section 203. All that he said in relation to that section was in relation to section 203, but the Senator now refers to paragraph 12 of section 214, on page 29, the relief provision.

Mr. LENROOT. I did not think that this language permitted the carrying of a loss sustained during one year back into a previous year.

Mr. SMOOT. But it does provide that it shall be carried to a succeeding year.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I may call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to paragraph (c) on page 9, which reads:

(c) If for any taxable year ending after January 1, 1919, it appears upon the production of evidence satisfactory to the commissioner that any taxpayer (other than a life insurance company) has sustained a net loss, the amount of such net loss shall under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, be deducted from the net income of the taxpayer for the preceding taxable year; and the taxes imposed by this title and by Title III for such preceding taxable year shall be redetermined accordingly.

I think the Senator has overlooked——

Mr. LENROOT. I may be wrong, but I had assumed that the words "sustained during the preceding year" also applied to subdivision (b), though, perhaps, I am wrong about it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Subdivision (b), if the Senator will bear with me a moment, was intended to provide for cases where losses have already been made. I know when the paragraph was drawn I had in mind the drought conditions of the West with respect to the cattle and sheep business. I know that during the last two or three years stockmen of the West have been suffering losses. So it was intended that if during the year 1918 the stockman made a profit and had in the year 1917 suffered an actual loss he could deduct the losses of 1917 from the profits of 1918. That is what subsection (b) means. Now, subsection (c) assumes that a profit is made in 1918. In 1919 the stockman suffers a loss. Paragraph (b) permits the commissioner then to readjust the taxes of 1918 and deduct the losses of 1919.

Mr. LENROOT. I agree with the Senator as to those provisions. I was not referring to those provisions, but to the one which was really under discussion, on page 29, with reference to inventories.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. All these are to be read together.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to ask the Senator with the construction of subdivision (b) that he now gives, if the only case where that would apply would not be where there was no profit during the year and it was necessary to carry it back into the preceding year in order to afford relief, because otherwise there would be a loss accruing during the year and it would be entitled to be deducted as a matter of course against the profit.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the Senator interpreted correctly paragraph (b) that he had in mind, but I believe the paragraph to which I have just referred will meet the situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota wishes to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. GRONNA. I will withdraw it for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The next amendment passed over was, under the head of "Inventories," page 8, line 10, after the word "may," to strike out "approve or"; in line 11, after the word "prescribe," to insert "as conforming as nearly as may be to the best accounting practice in the trade or business and"; and in line 13, after the word "income," to strike out "of the taxpayer," so as to read:

INVENTORIES.

SEC. 203. That whenever in the opinion of the commissioner the use of inventories is necessary in order clearly to determine the income of any taxpayer, inventories shall be taken by such taxpayer upon such basis as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may prescribe as conforming as nearly as may be to the best accounting practice in the trade or business and as most clearly reflecting the income.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 8, after line 13, to insert:

NET LOSSES.

SEC. 204. (a) That as used in this section the term "net loss" refers only to net losses resulting from either (1) the operation of any business regularly carried on by the taxpayer, or (2) the bona fide sale by the taxpayer of plant, buildings, machinery, equipment, or other facilities constructed, installed, or acquired by the taxpayer on or after April 6, 1917, for the production of articles contributing to the prosecution of the present war; and when so resulting means the excess of the deductions allowed by law (excluding in the case of corporations amounts received as dividends from a corporation which is taxable under this title upon its net income) over the sum of the gross income plus any interest received free from taxation both under this title and under Title III.

(b) If for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1916, and ending not later than December 31, 1918, it appears upon the production of evidence satisfactory to the commissioner that any taxpayer (other than a life insurance company) has sustained a net loss, the amount of such net loss shall, under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, be allowed as a deduction in computing the net income of the taxpayer for the succeeding taxable year.

(c) If for any taxable year ending after January 1, 1919, it appears upon the production of evidence satisfactory to the commissioner that any taxpayer (other than a life insurance company) has sustained a net loss, the amount of such net loss shall, under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, be deducted from the net income of the taxpayer for the preceding taxable year; and the taxes imposed by this title and by Title III for such preceding taxable year shall be redetermined accordingly. Any amount found to be due to the taxpayer upon the basis of such redetermination shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 252. If such net loss is in excess of the net income for such preceding taxable year, the amount of such excess shall, under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, be allowed as a deduction in computing the net income for the succeeding taxable year.

(d) The benefit of this section shall be allowed to the members of a partnership and the beneficiaries of an estate or trust under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, as indicated by the Senator from Utah in response to some question that I asked him, this is a very far-reaching amendment, more important than I think many Members outside of the Finance Committee perhaps realize. It is something entirely new with reference to a taxation policy in the United States. It proposes instead of treating a taxable year as a unit to group them into two or three taxable years as the case may be. It provides that in the case of net losses occurring either from the ordinary conduct of business or from "the bona fide sale by the taxpayer of plant, buildings, machinery, equipment or other facilities, constructed, installed, or acquired by the taxpayer on or after April 6, 1917, for the production of articles contributing to the prosecution of the present war," these net losses may be taken into consideration. In other taxable years the net loss is deducted from the gross income of other taxable years, and in some cases the amount paid in a previous taxable year is refunded to the taxpayer. For instance, a taxpayer may have sustained a loss in 1917, and he may have made a very large profit during the year 1918. Nevertheless if the provision becomes a law that taxpayer can go back to 1917 if he has sustained a loss, we will say of $50,000, and deduct that loss from his profits of 1918. That is one provision.

The next provision, subdivision (c), provides that if after January 1, 1919, a loss is sustained, that loss may be turned back to the preceding taxable year, the tax for that preceding year redetermined, and considering that loss as a reduction a refund may be made to the taxpayer of the taxes he has already paid to the Government; and if that be not sufficient the bill provides that that loss may be carried into the next succeeding year. So in that case we may have three years in two of which a loss was incurred and in only one of which there has been a profit realized, and the taxpayer is permitted instead of paying his taxes year by year and treating each year as a unit, as has been the custom not only by the Federal Government but by every State of the Union since the beginning of the Government, we are to treat it as a three-year period and he is required to pay only his average profit for the three years.

The importance of this provision becomes very apparent when we look into the future and realize that possibly in the very near future we may have an industrial depression. We may have, instead of profits upon the part of a very considerable percentage of the industries of the country, actual losses. Although they may make large profits during the year 1918, we propose to this extent at least to insure them in future against losses and provide that if they sustain losses in the future we will pay them back when the taxes have been a revenue to the Government for the year 1918.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this is clearly wrong and can not be defended, because the Government must have money to carry on its operations. Taxes must be paid for that purpose whether business is conducted at a profit or whether it is conducted at a loss. The excise taxes that are found in this bill are imposed whether the seller is carrying on his business at a profit or whether it is carried on at a loss. When you pay taxes upon real estate you pay upon its value irrespective of whether you may next year sustain a loss, and you get no credit for the subsequent year by a refund of the taxes that you have paid during the previous year because of the loss you have sustained the subsequent year.

Some one, Mr, President, must pay the taxes to run this Government, and it is not fair, it is not just, to say to a business that is conservatively managed, that does make a profit in the future, and that does have an income tax to pay, "The portion of the profit that you make will be paid into the Federal Treasury for the purpose of paying back to some competitor of yours who did not manage his business in a conservative way, and who took speculative chances; we will tax you for the purpose of refunding to him a portion of the taxes which he paid upon the profit that he did make."

Mr. President, take the case of a grain speculator. One year he may make enormous profits; the subsequent year he may suffer a great loss; and yet this bill proposes to take the money of the business men of this country, and, in the case of that speculator, if he suffers a loss, to pay back to him the income taxes that he properly and rightfully paid during the years that he did make a large profit.

Mr. President, I am wholly in sympathy with the amendment that we have been discussing for the past hour or two with reference to losses upon inventories and the refund that is there provided; I can see some justification for making an adjustment in the case of the sale of plants acquired since April 6, 1917, for war purposes, and where a loss has been entailed; but I can see no justification for applying that principle to ordinary business which is carried on in the ordinary way. There might be reason for some legislation of this kind if the transaction out of which a loss occurred began in a taxable year and was not ended or the loss not incurred until a subsequent taxable year; but what justification can there be when here is a business during the year 1918 which is making a profit during that entire year, and its business is closed, and then we come along to the year 1919, and that same business suffers a loss, not through any transactions which were begun in 1918, but through transactions which were begun and ended in 1919?

Mr. President, it seems to me that if the Senate realized the scope of these sections, realized their possible effect upon the Treasury of the United States in the future, it would not adopt them. I sincerely hope that before this amendment is finally passed upon there may be a fuller attendance of the Senate, in order that the Senate may act upon these sections intelligently and not simply vote upon them without consideration. I therefore make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of no quorum having been made, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] are detained on important public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I wish only to restate, as so many other Senators are now present, the proposition which is involved in the pending amendment. I want to say to Senators that the Senate is now about to vote upon one of the most important amendments to this bill, and one which, in my judgment, should demand the serious and careful consideration of every Member of this body.

The proposition is this: If this amendment be adopted, if an individual taxpayer or a corporation sustained a loss in 1917, though the matter be closed, although he or they may have made very large profits in 1918, when they come to make their return next year they will be permitted to deduct the loss which was incurred in 1917 against the net income of 1918. That is the first part of the amendment.

If next year the taxpayer sustains a loss, although he may have made a large profit this year he will be permitted next year to have his income tax of 1918 redetermined, and the loss of 1919 deducted from 1918; and if the loss was larger than the income he will be entitled to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States as a refund the amount represented by that deduction. If that is not satisfactory, under the bill he will be allowed to carry into 1920 the balance of that loss, to be used as a deduction against the income of 1919.

Mr. President, I do not know whether or not the Finance Committee have any estimates of how much is involved or how much the loss of revenue will be to this Government, but I should like to ask whether any member of the committee has any estimate upon that subject?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think there has been any specific estimate with respect to that, but the expert of the Treasury Department advises me that in making his general estimate that was taken into consideration. He does not say, however, and has not estimated definitely how much the loss would be specifically on this item. That might be a very difficult thing to do. All he could do probably would be to make an estimate in taking this loss, if any, in connection with a number of other losses, and estimate what the total losses would amount to; and therefore to what extent such total losses would affect the revenue.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to my colleague, in answer to his question, that while I think the expert who made the calculations would agree that it is very difficult to estimate the loss with any degree of accuracy, yet an allowance, I am informed, of $200,000,000 was made to cover the loss of revenue under this section.

Mr. LENROOT. Assuming that a loss——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the junior Senator from Wisconsin pardon me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the junior Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, my information is that in making the estimate—of course, on account of the indefinite character of the losses no altogether satisfactory figures could be arrived at—the expert advises me that it is his opinion, as it was expressed to the committee, that the loss would run somewhere between $100,000,000 and $200,000,000.

The Senator from Wisconsin will recognize that this provision of the bill is one that was intended for the benefit of the taxpayer; it was intended to relieve the taxpayer from certain losses that might be incident to the fluctuation of values during this very uncertain period in which we have been operating and during the very uncertain inventories of values in the years designated in the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. This amendment does not cover inventories. That matter is fully covered elsewhere.

Mr. SIMMONS. It does not exactly cover inventories, but it covers losses.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, with the permission of the junior Senator from Wisconsin, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. The junior Senator from Wisconsin has made a very clear and concise statement as to the understanding he has of this provision, and I desire to know whether or not the chairman of the committee agrees with that statement?

Mr. SIMMONS. In the main. I have not heard the whole of the statement, for I was out of the Chamber for a while. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] is looking especially after this particular item. I have not, I repeat, fully heard the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Wisconsin stated a moment ago in three or four sentences his contention as to what this amendment permits the taxpayer to do. I want to know whether or not the committee agrees with the Senator in that statement?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, if I have understood the Senator from Wisconsin, he has made a very clear and distinct statement of these provisions of this bill and just what is intended by them. After the Senator from Wisconsin shall have concluded his remarks I shall assume to give my views to the Senate regarding the merits of the proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Just for the RECORD, I wish to say that the $200,000,000 also covers the amendment on page 29, which refers to the individual, as well as the amendment of a similar character on page 60, which has reference to corporations.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, assuming that the amendments which we are now considering were estimated to involve a reduction in revenue of only $100,000,000, it is fair to assume that that estimate is made upon the assumption that business will go on as usual; and if it is fair to assume that there will be a loss of revenue to the Government from this amendment of $100,000,000 with business going on as usual, if an industrial depression does come, it is fair to say that the loss of revenue growing out of this amendment will be not $100,000,000 but at least $1,000,000,000; so the Senate may realize and appreciate the importance of this amendment.

More than that, Mr. President, it would not be so bad if the Government were able to dispense with that revenue, but if we lose the billion dollars in this direction it must be raised just the same; it must be raised in some other way and in some other direction; and it will be raised, if not in this way, from the business of this country, irrespective of whether it is conducted at a profit or at a loss. Every stamp tax that is imposed must be paid, whether the transaction be a profitable one or not; every excise tax that is imposed must be paid whether it be a profitable transaction or not, and there can be no reason why we should go back to 1917 and permit a deduction of any loss that might then have accrued to reduce the amount of taxes upon an income realized this year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to make one suggestion right now?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator will agree that in the particular case I am about to cite, at any rate, the provision is just. I had a letter a short time ago, while the committee was considering this bill, from a farmer in my State operating a very large farm. On account of excessive wet weather in 1916 he lost practically all of his crop. In 1917 he again lost his entire crop. He writes me that the total losses for the two years were approximately $80,000. It was necessary for him to go to the bank, mortgage his farm, and mortgage his crop for the ensuing year in order to continue his business. In 1918 he made upon the same farm a profit of about $40,000, so that he is still behind $40,000 for this three years of labor. He has no means with which to pay except from his crops, and those crops are entirely mortgaged. Having lost his entire crop in 1916 and 1917—and the committee went back only one year—having lost an entire crop, amounting to $40,000, in 1917, the committee thought he might deduct that as against a gain of $40,000 in 1918. Of course, if we take the two years, his business would still show a loss of $40,000.

It does seem to me where there has been such a heavy loss in 1917, or where a business, for instance, started in 1917—and most businesses lose in the first year—and lost, say, $400,000 or $500,000 in 1917 but made a profit of $600,000 in 1918, that we ought to give an allowance for the loss in entering into the business. But, irrespective of that, it certainly seems to me that allowance ought to be made where the losses have been heavy in 1917 as against a profit made in 1918.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. This country has experienced more than once times of general depression, when, instead of profits being the rule, losses were practically universal. It is entirely possible, as I think the Senator will agree, that that condition may be before us; I do not say it will be, but it may be before us within the next two years. That being so, under this amendment, not only securing no revenue from business being conducted at a loss but being compelled to refund to them hundreds of millions of dollars, I should like to ask the Senator where we are going to get the money to pay the obligations of the Government, carry on its operations, and refund this money under this provision of the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will say frankly that I do not consider the losses will be very heavy from that source; but, in any event, we only go 12 months back in allowing the deduction.

Mr. LENROOT. And 12 months forward.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, let us consider the 12 months back first. The Senator would allow a deduction of 12 months. Now, suppose that the loss occurred during 15 months back, and it was a heavy loss. Is 24 months an unreasonable time to go back in the case of a business when there has been, taking the two years, a loss, the business having expended more than it gained? If a man has made no gain from his business in two years, we ought not to tax him for an income when he does not really make that income. That is my answer.

Mr. LENROOT. The whole theory of the income-tax law is that a man shall pay taxes each year according to the income that he makes that year. That is the theory of the income-tax law; and this provision would wholly and totally upset that theory and make the basis a three-year average instead of providing for a tax on the annual income.

The Senator says that it is not at all likely that any considerable loss to the Government will accrue under these provisions. If, perchance, we should have a condition within the next few years such as we had in 1893, I want to ask the Senator whether he does not believe the Government would lose at least a billion dollars under these amendments?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I do not think so.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly at that time losses were universal; profits were the exception; and yet in adopting this amendment there is no safeguard against such a condition. We will not only be confronted with the problem of raising sufficient money to carry on the operations of the Government, but to raise sufficient money to refund to the men who have suffered losses. Under this amendment we propose to take some of the money of the able and successful manufacturer who operates his business in a businesslike way to pay back to the manufacturer who, instead of paying attention to his business, may be spending his time upon Broadway and letting his business run into the ground. That is the reward we give to the unbusinesslike man, penalizing the legitimate, conservative, successful man in so doing.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, as I have already said, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has made a very clear statement regarding this provision of this bill. I wish to present the situation which caused the committee to put this provision in the bill, and, when I shall have done that, I believe the Senate will conclude that the committee has solved the problem in the best way that it could have been solved. There is not any pretension that this provision of the bill, as in the case of a great many other provisions of the bill, is a perfect solution of the problem, but it meets a concrete situation in the very best way that the committee could find to meet it.

The Senator from Wisconsin overlooks one great principle which will be found running through this bill from beginning to end. The principle will appear more certainly and in sharper contrast in the amendments put in by the Senate committee than in the bill as it came from the House. It was recognized that the bill as it came from the House contained many inequities. There still remain some in the bill, but I believe that the committee may very well pride itself upon the fact that many of these inequities and injustices have been eliminated from the bill. In the first place, the committee proceeded upon the theory that these taxes should be levied upon those most able to pay, and wherever you find anything changed in this bill you will find the change with that thing always in mind—that it is the ability to pay which is taxed. Does the Senator object to that principle? Does he not realize that when we are levying these great war taxes here the burdens of this war should rest more upon those who can pay, those who have the ability to pay, rather than those who have not?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. As the Senator asks me the question, I say in reply that where a man has made a very large profit, an excessive profit, he ought not to be entitled to have a loss deducted that he may have made two or three years in the past, when you are continuing in this bill excise taxes that are imposed not according to ability to pay but arbitrarily imposed, whether the man who is compelled to pay them is making a profit or a loss.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator objects to going back beyond the year, and he says that such a thing as that is unknown to this country. He is correct in that regard; but he must bear in mind that this country is very young in the establishment of income taxes. If you go to England, which has had an income-tax law for sixty-odd years, you will find that England not only takes into consideration the condition of the man's business during the previous year, but takes into consideration the state of his business for a period of three years; or, in other words, after long experience in England it has been recognized that the very thing for which the Senator from Wisconsin is contending is not justified by the experience of business at all. You can not measure the prosperity or adversity of a business by any one year. You have got to take a series of years; and if I had my way about it, instead of being limited to the year 1917 I would go back at least a year further, because it is the period of years which indicates the business prosperity, the profits of the business. You can not measure it by one year alone.

If you should undertake to do that, then the Senator would put into this bill a provision which would take from it the very relief which he himself says he wants. You take the man with a high inventory at the end of this year 1918. You say that if it is subsequently disclosed that he made a loss in 1918 you are willing to allow him some adjustment. You never can find out that he made any loss in 1918, because when he makes up his inventory at the end of the year 1918, it is a real inventory; it is based upon real values; and, as already explained here, the business man has the best of the situation, so that if there are any losses at all they occur in 1919, and in no manner can you attribute that loss to the year 1918. So the Senator would defeat the very thing which he has favored in this bill, and that is to grant some relief for losses in a previous year.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. In the case the Senator now refers to, in every case where that will apply, the transaction must have originated in the previous year, must it not?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Why, not at all; not necessarily so.

Mr. LENROOT. Otherwise there could have been no inventory to which it applies.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Every business man takes an inventory at the beginning of the year, or at the end of the year, whichever you choose to call it.

Mr. LENROOT. What I mean is that the inception of the transaction must have occurred during the previous taxable year.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not at all.

Mr. LENROOT. The goods must have been purchased, must they not?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Oh, he has goods on hand.

Mr. LENROOT. I mean prior to that time. It did not all occur within the year?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Absolutely so; and the Senator can not present the situation otherwise. In other words, on the 1st of January, 1919, the inventoried stocks of goods of this country will be worth every dollar at which they are inventoried, because they are inventoried either at the market value at that time or at the cost price, whichever is the lower. So any dealer who takes his inventory on the 1st of January, 1919, will have the value at least dollar for dollar for every dollar shown upon his books; so if there are any losses which occur in 1919 they are attributable only to the business of that year, and by no way of reasoning can you say that they originated in the year 1918 or are attributable in any part to the business of 1918.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. If the inventory consists of a thousand barrels of flour owned by the taxpayer, that business transaction originated—the purchase of the flour, the entering upon that venture out of which the loss eventually occurs—prior to the taxable year. That is very plain.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, this situation was presented to the committee: The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] gave a very graphic illustration of what was presented to us for consideration. A man in 1917 suffered an absolute loss in his business. I do not mean by "loss" a mere lack of making profits, but a loss—a reduction of capital. So he starts into business in the year 1918 with a debit to profit and loss of a certain amount on his books from the preceding year. That means a reduction in his capital. If we assume that he suffered a loss of $100,000 in 1917, he still carries that in his profit-and-loss account, and shows it there as a charge to profit and loss. If in the year 1918 he makes a profit of $100,000, he has simply balanced the account; and if in making the loss of the $100,000 in 1917 he had to borrow the money, mortgage his plant, mortgage his farm, he has taken the $100,000 and paid off the mortgage. He has gotten square with the world again, unless the United States says to him that he shall do precisely what the Senator from Wisconsin wants—that he shall not go back and recoup his losses; that he has made a profit of $100,000, and under the terms of this bill he will pay a tax of $25,000 of it to the United States. How is he going to get his $25,000 to pay the United States? He has used his $100,000 in paying off the mortgage. Now, the Senator from Wisconsin would ask him to go and mortgage it again for $25,000 and turn that $25,000 over to the United States. That is the result of the argument of the Senator. When a man simply is recouping losses, why do we want to tax him.

In this bill there will be found other places where the tax could be raised which we are losing by this remedial process. We do lose money by this provision in the bill; but are you going to tax the farmer of the country, the stockman of the country, the business man of the country who suffers an absolute loss, who incurs a debt, and who subsequently makes money with which to pay the debt and does pay it—are you going to tax him for paying his debt?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose the losses are the rule instead of the exception, whom would the Senator have pay the taxes of this Government?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator is suggesting a case which never has occurred in the history of the United States, and which can not occur in any country, where all the business of the country will suffer a loss in any one year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that if everybody loses instead of gaining, then you have no profits to tax, and you ought not to tax a loss.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It stands to reason, Mr. President, that whenever a man loses he loses to somebody, and the somebody to whom he loses makes a gain; so the Senator's statement results finally in what would appear to be an absurdity.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Who does the Senator think made the tremendous losses occurring in 1893?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will ask the Senator to present his statistics. He is claiming great losses in 1893.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator remembers as well as I do the extreme depression in every line of business in that year.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I remember an extreme depression. I remember a time, back in the year 1893, when people were not making money; but when the Senator undertakes to leave the impression that all of the business of the country combined and uniformly was suffering absolute loss, which would become a charge under this provision on the prosperity of the previous year, I say that he is all wrong. That situation never has occurred, and it can not occur; and so it will only be in isolated cases that there will be an absolute loss. There may be a reduction of profits, but that is not cared for in this bill, and no pretention is made to care for it.

It is simply where the man in the subsequent year fails to make a profit, and does more, suffers a loss of capital; and then we go back, take the taxes, or a part of them, which he has paid to the Government during the previous year, recoup those losses, restore his capital, put him on his feet, and let him do business again. That is what we seek to do in this bill. If he has not made a loss in the past year, but if he should make a loss in the year 1918, or if he has not made a loss in the previous years but should make a loss after the year 1919, then we are now looking forward from 1917 and 1918; we are looking forward in that provision, but if in 1919 he makes a loss he can come back, and if it is not sufficient to satisfy that loss he can carry the net loss on to the succeeding year so as to balance up, restore him, put him on his feet, as I have said, and enable him to do business again.

Does not the Senator want the business of this country put upon that foundation? Does the Senator, when he gets the farmer down, want to keep him down? Does he want to keep the manufacturer down when he is down? Does he want to tax him at these high rates as though every dollar of income were absolute profit, destroy his business, or handicap him in carrying on business in competition with his neighbor? Does the Senator want to do that?

It seems to me that if the Senator will only give a second consideration to this provision, instead of condemning it, he will thank the committee for having presented it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, as the Senator addresses his inquiry directly to me, I will reply to it that the Senator from Wisconsin is not in favor of taxing a properly conducted, well managed business for the purpose of recouping the losses of an improvidently managed, speculative, hazardous business. The Senator from New Mexico apparently is.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, in regard to that, the Senator must understand that the hazardous businesses of this country compete with each other. They are not in competition with the stable industries of the country, and so the discrimination suggested by the Senator's remark seems to me not to be justified by business experience. The refund simply comes from the money which the particular taxpayer himself has put into the Treasury.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have listened very carefully to the able argument of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], as well as to the argument of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. I am not going to condemn, nor am I in the few words I am about to express going to commend the provision; but I want to call the attention of the Senator from New Mexico to what happened in what we call the spring-wheat States in 1916. That year was what we call the black-rust year, and I will say that 95 per cent of the farmers of the Northwest lost money.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. What year was that?

Mr. GRONNA. Nineteen hundred and sixteen. Some of the farmers applied to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in 1917 and asked if they might be permitted to deduct their losses for 1916. Of course they were told that they could not do so. Now the Senator says that it is simply isolated cases where taxes have been imposed when an entire industry has sustained a loss. I must differ with the Senator in that respect. Not only the State which I have the honor in part to represent but the neighboring State to the south and the western portion of the State to the east of us sustained heavy losses. Of course, if they made no profit that year, they paid no tax; but if they made a profit in 1917, which most of them did, they did pay the tax without deducting their losses in 1916. I know single farmers who sustained a loss of more than $15,000 in 1916 and who were not permitted to deduct a single penny in 1917.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from North Dakota that that is just the reason why we are putting that provision in this bill. We are trying to remedy now a thing which the present law makes a hardship.

Mr. GRONNA. Why begin this departure now and leave out what has actually happened in past years?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I stated to the Senator that so far as I was personally concerned I would be willing to go back and take in the year 1916; but the rates of that year were very low, so there was very little income tax paid in 1916. The rates were low, and it was thought that the difficulties of administration would not justify it. Besides, I am perfectly willing to state that there were some expressions of opposition to this amendment in the committee. Some of them thought that we ought not to go back at all, but that we ought to make this provision of the bill simply prospective. That opinion was expressed, and so this amendment as it appears here now is really a compromise of the views of the committee upon it. We have adjusted our differences as far as we can, some wanting it wholly prospective, and some of us—the Senator from North Dakota and myself—wanting it to go back for two years instead of one.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood as saying that I want to go back to 1916. I fully realize that some one has to pay the tax, although it is an injustice to a great many people; and it was an injustice, because the very people upon whom this very tax, this heavy burden, fell had to borrow the money. The farmer, as a rule, does not have a large reserve. The only way that this tax could be paid was by borrowing it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think that was a great injustice.

Mr. GRONNA. But even so, Mr. President, I am not willing to say that we should open up this great question and go back to 1916. The farmers were able to pay the tax, and they did pay it; and I believe that we should not enter upon this new departure now, when we have reason to believe that many of the investments made by those who are engaged in the different industries will decrease. The Senator knows as well as I do that it is not only possible but probable that values in a great many of these industries where capital has been invested are bound to decrease; but we never heard of such a thing as this proposal when it was simply a question of the farmer and his industry, and I might say his very existence was in danger. You are basing this argument upon the question of justice to the farmer. I want to say that I do not believe that it is the farmer altogether and his interest which enters into this question.

Now, Mr. President, I do not wish the Senator from New Mexico to misunderstand me. I have not asked that we go back to 1916. I myself, together with thousands of other farmers, paid our tax, although we borrowed the money to do so in 1917; but I am not complaining. I am simply calling to your attention, sir, the fact that if it is an injustice now, it was an injustice done to us then; and I believe that it would have been possible for the administration to interpret the law so as not to have permitted that injustice. I believe that the revenue law as it is upon the statute books to-day could have been interpreted so as to exempt those people who actually sustained a loss from paying this unjust tax. I know of provisions that were liberally interpreted, at least more so than the provision which has reference to the farming industry, and to their inventories, and it is only for that reason that I have called attention to it. I believe, sir, that it is a dangerous field to enter upon. I believe that there is a probability that we will lose millions of dollars if we are to carry out this provision as it is written by the committee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, referring to the situation which the Senator has just presented with respect to the year 1916, I will state that the year 1916 was the year to which the law of 1917 applied, and if a loss was made in 1916 there was nothing from which that loss could be recouped, because the man who made the loss in 1916 never paid any tax.

Now, as to the probable extent of the loss under this provision, I call attention to these statistics. You will find in the statistical report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a statement of the number of corporations returning losses and the number returning profits, and it also gives the deficits of the corporations which returned losses and the earnings of those that made profits. The figures have just been handed me here. In 1917 the earnings of the corporations which paid a tax were $8,765,908,000. The deficits of the corporations which made losses were $656,904,000. So in the readjustment of that it can not possibly affect the Treasury very much, because only these corporations which showed deficits of $656,904,000 will be entitled to come under this relief at all, and then they could recover only the tax which they peradventure had paid the previous year.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is speaking now of the losses of 1917?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. These are the deficits of all corporations reporting losses.

Mr. LENROOT. For 1917?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. For 1917; yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment known as section 204.

Mr. LENROOT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I do not think the Senate understands the question before the body. As I understand, the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that is the question.

Mr. PENROSE. Some Senators do not understand it, and I think it ought to be presented before the roll call proceeds. All Senators who favor the committee amendment will vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to say that the question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee commencing on line 15, page 8, under the title of "Net losses," and extending over to page 10, line 8.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the Senators are familiar with the substance of the amendment on which they are voting, but I do not think many Senators knew in what form the question was presented. It was not presented by the Chair, and that is the reason why I call attention to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calling of the roll will be resumed.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote for the amendment, and I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who I do not believe is in the Chamber; but as he is a member of the Committee on Finance and would doubtless and as far as I know vote in favor of the amendment of the committee, I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I recall the fact that he supported this amendment in the committee, and as I, too, am in favor of the amendment, I take the liberty of voting. I vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded,

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. ROBINSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "nay."

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). I find that my pair, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], is out of the city. I therefore transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. COLT. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I understand that he would vote as I intend to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] are detained on important public business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]; and

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 17, as follows:

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 17, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 16, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. Earle Wilfley, of the Vermont Avenue Christian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O God, our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee this morning for the honors that have come to our country in these wonderful days at home and abroad; but we pray Thee, Heavenly Father, that these honors may be borne humbly and becomingly, and that greater honors may come to our great land, to its flag, and its Government because of the humanitarian principles for which we stand and the righteousness that exalteth a nation. So wilt Thou be pleased to-day to be with the sessions of this Congress, with all the deeds of those in high authority, and with all who have a part in the ongoing of our country and its cause. We ask for Thy name's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, December 14, 1918, and the Journal of the proceedings of Sunday, December 15, 1918, were read and approved.

HON. CARTER GLASS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he has a private letter from the Hon. CARTER GLASS, which, it seems to him, is really addressed to the House, and if there be no objection the Chair will have it read and put into the RECORD. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY,
December 16, 1918.

To the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

Because I can not trust myself from my place on the floor to tell how greatly distressed I am to sever a long-time association with the Congress as Member of the House from the sixth Virginia district, I ask leave to use this method of saying a parting word. My service of nearly nine terms ends to-day, when at noon I shall enter on a new task as Secretary of the Treasury. While I reckon at its very highest value the great honor attaching to the President's invitation to a seat in his Cabinet, I would like my colleagues to believe that no distinction ever has or ever can come to me which will be cherished above the personal affection and the generous confidence shown me by my legislative comrades at the Capitol.

To my political adversaries not one whit less than to intimate party friends am I indebted for invariable courtesy and a quite notable purpose, as far as my work was concerned, to aid in every perplexing situation where helpful counsel and patriotic cooperation were required to accomplish sane results.

With a very real appreciation of the great opportunities as well as of the grave difficulties of the Treasury portfolio, I shall approach them with painful misgivings as to my fitness for the test; but, in any event, I will confidently entertain the hope that I shall have the best wishes of the Congress in an honest endeavor wisely to use the opportunities presented and its indispensable aid in attempting to subdue the difficulties encountered.

With assurances of personal esteem, believe me, my dear Mr. Speaker,

Sincerely, yours,

CARTER GLASS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think it may be appropriate for me to say that CARTER GLASS, the new Secretary of the Treasury, certainly has the best wishes of every Member of this House in his new task. I think we all believe that no better selection could have been made for Secretary of the Treasury than the appointment of Mr. GLASS. [Applause.] His service in this House will be of inestimable value to him in the performance of the duties of his new office. He has the respect and the affectionate regard of the Members of Congress, and he has the best wishes of us all at all times personally and for his success officially in his new office. [Applause.]

TRANSPORTATION OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 13261) providing for the transportation from the District of Columbia of governmental employees whose services no longer are required, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 13261, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what are the Senate amendments?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that the Clerk read the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 14, strike out "March 31" and insert "January 15."

Page 2, lines 12 and 13, strike out the words "The foregoing limitation of 10 days shall operate" and insert "The time within which transportation shall be applied for shall be 20 days."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, one amendment is as to the length of time in which the act shall be effective, touching those who leave the service, and the other is the date within which claims shall be presented for those who have left the service.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. I would like to inquire whether if a war worker desires to resign and go home, that employee will be included within the terms of the bill, or must there be a discharge?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no. An employee of the Government who resigns would come within the purview of the act provided there was nothing against the service of the employee; that is, that the resignation was not one because of lack of efficient service.

Mr. ASWELL. In the case of a young woman who desires to go home, under these conditions will she be included within the terms of the bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. She will. That is one of the purposes of the bill.

Mr. ASWELL. That is, to encourage them to resign and go home.

Mr. SHERLEY. So far as the reason for asking for a conference is concerned, it seemed that in one instance there was an unnecessary length of time fixed by the Senate, and in the other that the time was curtailed to too short a period. There will be in some of the departments, of necessity, a need for quite a few weeks, perhaps a month or two, of a large number of clerks now engaged to be held without the benefit of this act, while others in that particular department should be dismissed. It seemed to be wise to let the matter go to conference, where the matter could be discussed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In connection with the fixing of the time, is the gentleman able to state to the House how soon the bill, if it is enacted by both bodies, can become a law?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois is as good and doubtless a better constitutional lawyer than I.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not admit that.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is aware——

Mr. MANN. I was asking what the practice was going to be.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is familiar with the provision of the Constitution which requires that bills that pass the two Houses shall be presented to the President for his approval or disapproval; that when presented to the President, unless disapproved by him, they shall become law within 10 days after such time, unless the Congress by its adjournment has made impossible his action. So I take it this bill will become a law, barring action by the President, in 10 days after its presentation to him.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware of what the present practice is as to bills sent to the White House?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no official knowledge.

Mr. MANN. I can inform the gentleman that bills that are now taken by the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills to the White House are received up there and a receipt is given that the bill is received in the absence of the President and for transmission to the President.

The ordinary receipt heretofore has been that the bill has been received by the President on such and such a date. Now they give a receipt that on such and such a date the bill is received in the absence of the President, but I am still curious if anybody can tell how long it will take to transmit a bill to the President, or if it is to be held awaiting his return. That makes quite a difference about a bill.

Mr. GILLETT. I have been told, going a little further than the gentleman has, that they are to be sent to the President in France, and I confess I think that is the right thing to do.

Mr. MADDEN. In the meantime when will it become effective?

Mr. GILLETT. Of course, it will not become a law until it reaches the President and he signs it and it is returned.

Mr. MADDEN. And in the meantime 50,000 or 60,000 people here are on the pay roll who ought not to be there.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have been told that they would recognize a cable to the effect that the bill had been signed in Paris——

Mr. GILLETT. I had not heard that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As being the time it would go into effect.

Mr. MANN. I spoke about the official record because I have seen the decision.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the practice which will be adopted, this particular bill is so drawn that the benefits of the bill will flow irrespective of the particular date that it is going upon the statute books, because provision was made in the terms of the bill for the taking care of those cases where there was separation from the service after a date fixed, and I take it that we need not now engage in discussion touching the probable or proper or actual course that may be followed in connection with the presentation of this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. After all, under all conditions, does the Vice President become the President?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, the gentleman's opinion is entitled to weight, and his question indicates an opinion. I came to the conclusion some years ago that a little law will go further before the House than any place in the world. I do not want to illustrate that saying by undertaking now to qualify upon a question of constitutional law. I may have an opinion, but I do not think it is necessary that I should undertake to state one, when every Member probably has one and will continue to have it irrespective of mine.

Mr. CANNON. The question has an interrogation point at the end of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman shows his usual skill in interrogation. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENISON. I was going to suggest that perhaps the chairman of the committee or somebody else would present this whole subject to Mr. Burleson——

The SPEAKER. That has got nothing to do with——

Mr. DENISON. And that perhaps they might use the telautograph, by which a bill could be signed in Paris, and have it transmitted by some sort of system to this country by wireless.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, greater physical difficulties than that have been overcome, I might say to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk announced the following conferees: Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, and Mr. GILLETT.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow in the death of the Hon. BENJAMIN RYAN TILLMAN, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate, in pursuance of an order heretofore made, assembles to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a mark of further respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. FOCHT was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of illness in his family.

PRINTING LETTER OF DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS AS A HOUSE DOCUMENT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the letter written to me by the Director General of Railroads be printed as a House document.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. TREADWAY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. On the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. TREADWAY. I understood that matter had been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. No. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what letter is this?

Mr. SIMS. It is a letter of Director General McAdoo, addressed to myself as chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in which he suggests the continuance of Government operation of railroads for a period of five years.

Mr. GILLETT. I remember the last letter that was sent to the gentleman from a Cabinet officer consisted largely of mutual compliments and laudations, and I thought I should object to any future letters of that kind. I understand this is not of that kind?

Mr. SIMS. This is in the RECORD.

Mr. GILLETT. Why does the gentleman want it printed again?

Mr. SIMS. Because there is a demand and request for it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] asks leave to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. TREADWAY. To submit a letter which I have written in reference to the war-risk insurance matter.

Mr. RAYBURN. I hope the gentleman will not do that and take up any more time on this one question which has been brought up here continually now for a week. The committee, I am sure, is going to report the bill to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. TREADWAY. It was a suggestion to Commissioner Nesbitt in the form of a communication which I thought might be of interest to the House.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13261) providing for the transportation from the District of Columbia of governmental employees whose services are no longer required.

RETENTION OF UNIFORM AND PERSONAL EQUIPMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13366) permitting those who have served in the Army during the present war to retain one complete uniform.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13366) permitting any person who has served in the Army in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I ask to have it read.

Mr. MANN. Let it be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who served in the United States Army in the present war may, upon honorable discharge and return to civil life, permanently retain one complete suit of outer uniform clothing, including the overcoat, and such articles of personal equipment as may be authorized by the Secretary of War, and may wear such uniform clothing after such discharge: Provided, That the uniform above referred to shall include some distinctive mark or insignia to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, such mark or insignia to be issued by the War Department to all enlisted personnel so discharged.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman, first, if it requires legislation in order to do this?

Mr. DENT. That is the opinion of the War Department, and I think that is correct.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Have they issued an order on the subject?

Mr. DENT. They have issued an order that a uniform may be retained for four months, and then returned to the Government.

Mr. MANN. That order was issued some time ago?

Mr. DENT. That order was issued some time ago.

Mr. MANN. The statement was made that they had issued a new order. Has that been done?

Mr. DENT. I do not know of any new order. This bill was prepared, I will state to the gentleman, by the War Department, and has the approval of the Secretary of War, and is drawn and reported by the committee exactly as it was prepared, with the use of the word "personal" before "equipment," so as to exclude the idea that the Government would distribute any arms.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I have read in one of the papers here that such a bill had been prepared, and that the Secretary of War had anticipated the passage of it and had issued an order. The statement was made as coming from the Secretary himself, and I wondered whether the Secretary was seeking to obtain credit for the order ahead of the action by Congress, or whether action by Congress was required. The paper stated that the Secretary had done all this himself.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman that I have not seen the article in the paper myself and know absolutely nothing about it, but I assume that the Secretary would not have sent to me, as chairman of the committee, a bill upon this subject and requested its passage unless it was necessary.

Mr. MANN. I notice this bill requires some distinctive badge or mark placed upon the uniform of the enlisted man. What is that for?

Mr. DENT. To show he is not in the service.

Mr. MANN. Why should it not apply, then, to officers who are also discharged?

Mr. DENT. I think it should apply to officers.

Mr. MANN. The bill does not apply to officers. Why should an officer with his uniform make out that he is still in the Army when he has taken his discharge?

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. In one minute.

Mr. PADGETT. I would like to ask the gentleman if that ought not to apply to the Navy also?

Mr. DENT. I think it ought to apply to officers.

Mr. TILSON. The giving of the device is only to enlisted men, but if the gentleman will read the early part of the bill he will see that it says "any person who served," and so forth.

Mr. DENT. It only requires a distinctive mark to be placed upon the enlisted man's uniform.

Mr. McKENZIE Will the gentleman yield? I will simply state that in the national-defense act there is now a law covering the uniforms of officers, and it provides on what occasions they may wear the uniform. And inasmuch as the officer owns his uniform, there is a very great distinction between the uniforms of officers and those of private soldiers. And one of the purposes of permitting these young men to have one uniform and to wear it continuously, perhaps until it is worn out, is the fact that they will save millions and millions or conserve millions and millions of dollars' worth of wool. And it is not only economical, in my judgment, but just.

Mr. DENT. I know.

Mr. MANN. There is not any question about that. This is new law. It apparently permits an officer to wear his uniform without any distinguishing mark. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] is usually correct, but I am not sure about this matter.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. Let me make this suggestion, Mr. Speaker: I think the point made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is well taken, and I am going to ask to amend the bill on page 2, line 1.

The SPEAKER. You can not do it now. Unanimous consent has not been given for the consideration of the bill as yet.

Mr. DENT. I suggest this amendment in advance of unanimous consent—that the bill be amended, on page 2, line 1, by inserting, after the word "all," the words "officers and."

Mr. MANN. That could be reached by striking out the word "enlisted." in line 1, page 2.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will yield, it seems to me that what this proviso means is that the War Department shall furnish to the enlisted men this insignia. It says "that the uniform above referred to shall include some distinctive mark or insignia to be prescribed by the Secretary of War." Then, as a distinctive proposition, it provides that in the case of enlisted men it shall be furnished by the War Department. This is the construction I put upon the provision.

Mr. DENT. I do not think there can me any possible objection to adopting the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that there should be a distinctive mark upon the uniform of the officer who has been discharged or who has retired from the service as well as on the uniform of the enlisted man.

Mr. TILSON. I think that is taken care of in this proviso, when it says "that the uniform above referred to shall include some distinctive mark or insignia to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, such mark or insignia to be issued by the War Department to all enlisted personnel so discharged." The enlisted personnel is provided for, and is the only portion of the Army provided for in the issue of the prescribed insignia.

Mr. DENT. Well, certainly there can not be any objection to making the law clear. I do not think there should be any distinction. It should include the officer as well as the enlisted man.

Mr. TILSON. It is already clear, but I see no objection to the War Department furnishing the insignia to officers as well. That is what the gentleman's amendment provides for—that the War Department shall furnish the insignia to the officers as well as to the enlisted men.

Mr. POU. The gentleman from Connecticut is absolutely right, I submit.

Mr. TILSON. The language is as clear as day.

Mr. POU. It does not need any amendment.

Mr. GILLETT. It does not need any amendment at all. It is all right as it is.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Can the gentleman tell us what is intended to be included in the phrase on line 7, "and such articles of personal equipment as may be authorized by the Secretary of War"? The soldier is permitted to retain "one complete suit of outer uniform clothing, including the overcoat, and such articles of personal equipment as may be authorized by the Secretary of War."

Mr. DENT. That would include his underclothing, and it might include a gas mask that he has used.

Mr. ROGERS. That brings me to the question I wanted to ask. For some weeks the soldiers discharged from the Army have been allowed to retain several suits of underwear and several pairs of stockings, and so forth, in their possession. Now, has that been done under authority of law or executive discretion?

Mr. DENT. It has been done under a regulation adopted by the War Department.

Mr. ROGERS. But not under authority of law?

Mr. DENT. No.

Mr. GORDON. There is a regulation authorizing them to keep three suits.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman understands the distinction between underclothing and uniforms. When the underclothing is issued it may be accounted for as having been expended. They do not take it back and issue it to another soldier. In the case of the uniform they can do that, but when the underclothing is issued it may be accounted for as expended.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I called up Gen. Wood and asked him about this very thing this morning. I received the same explanation. I was informed that orders had been issued for men in the Marine Corps—and I do not know whether it applies to the Army or not—that underclothing and socks would be returned, and I asked Gen. Wood if that were to be true as to the Army and he said that all this clothing under the regulations would have to be returned within not longer than four months, and that the department was very anxious to have some measure passed because the expense of having it checked up and accounted for and returned would more than outweigh the cost.

Mr. DENT. And that this bill was framed in order to take care of that?

Mr. IGOE. Yes; and that this bill was contemplated in order that the department would be relieved in regard to this underclothing.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this refers to the outer clothing. I understand the soldier is required to return all his clothing, including his shirt and underwear. Why should not this apply to all the clothing he has?

Mr. DENT. It does.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But it says "outer clothing."

Mr. DENT. It says "one complete suit of outer uniform clothing, including the overcoat, and such articles of personal equipment as may be authorized by the Secretary of War."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the gentleman think underwear would be included in the term "personal equipment"?

Mr. DENT. I think so.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It would seem that, a distinction being made as to outer clothing, the inference would be drawn that it was not intended to apply to underclothing or shirts.

Mr. DENT. The hearings before the committee disclosed the idea that the man would be expected to retain such apparel as he had used.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think that word "apparel," then, should be put in.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. I would like to inquire, while we are legislating upon this subject, if we could not include the Navy?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Is the bill under consideration and open for amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. PADGETT. Why not provide for the Navy and Marine Corps and insert the words "Secretary of the Navy," following the words "Secretary of War"?

Mr. MANN. It should be done.

Mr. PADGETT. So as to make it complete as to the three services.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to that. We did not take jurisdiction because we did not have it.

Mr. PADGETT. I understand; but while we are legislating on this subject we should look out as well for all of them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two minutes before this is carried out.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. ASWELL. I reserve the right to object, if I may.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been called for twice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. On this bill?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, the first day Congress proceeded to business at this session I introduced a resolution directing that the enlisted men of the Army and the Marine Corps be given their uniforms, the other departments of the Government all being included without any additional law, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] promptly objected to my resolution and prevented its consideration. I proceeded immediately to present the matter to the General Staff of the War Department, and I was requested to submit the resolution and to offer suggestions to the proposed resolution that I had introduced upon the floor of this House. I did so. I was informed that the bill would be prepared by the War College. I was told that the General Staff would have the bill written out in a way that would be acceptable to the War Department. Later on, in the course of human events, some week or so later, I received a very short notice, and in accordance with the archaic and fossilized and granulated rules and regulations of this House and the War Department in giving the superiority of prestige to the time or term of attendance—the rule of seniority that has been so recently so conducive to the success (?) of the Democratic Party in this country—according to that rule of priority, fossilized as it is, I received a letter from the War Department in two lines, telling me that the legislation had been prepared and that it had been presented to the proper committee, and that, therefore, it would be handled without any activity on the part of any individual. That last part I put in myself, because that is what it meant. [Laughter.]

I merely call the attention of the House to the fact that my resolution provided that the enlisted men be permitted to keep their uniforms. It is stated in the bill as "personal equipment," which means all the uniforms—their underclothes, shoes, uniforms, and hats or caps. I submit to this House that it is ridiculous and absurd for the underclothing and shoes and one or two suits of underclothing to be salvaged by the War Department or destroyed, when it would be of very great value to those soldiers if permitted to be retained.

Gentlemen of the House, it is absolutely absurd to talk about the top clothes and take the other suits away from these young men. I am for the bill if you do not give them anything but one shoe. I am for anything that you can give these boys, but it is clear that they should have their entire personal equipment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, page 2, line 1.

Page 2, line 1, strike out the word "enlisted."

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, did I understand the gentleman to say that the purpose of the amendment is to include officers along with the enlisted men?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield me three minutes?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether this amendment ought to be adopted. The purpose of this act is to amend the law now on the statute book covering the uniforms of enlisted men. Under the present law the enlisted man when discharged may wear his uniform at home and continue to wear it for three months. At the expiration of that period he is expected to return the uniform to the Government of the United States, the uniform being the property of the Government.

The purpose of this legislation is to enable the Government to give to each enlisted man one complete uniform, including the overcoat and such other articles of personal wearing apparel, things he has been using in the service, such as a helmet or a gas mask, as the Secretary of War may deem proper. In my judgment this law has nothing to do with officers or officers' uniforms. The officer owns his uniform; it belongs to him; he has paid for it, and the Congress of the United States has nothing to do with saying whether or not he shall have that uniform when he is discharged from the service. It is his personal property.

There is on the statute book, as a part of the national defense act, a provision which says under what circumstances an officer may wear his uniform. While I know that the purpose of my good friend from Alabama is to do the right thing, it will be a grave mistake to take the word "enlisted" out of the bill.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. McKENZIE. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. Under the national defense act the officer has the right to wear his uniform only on limited occasions.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Does not the gentleman believe that in this act, if we pass it, the officer can wear the uniform every day, and would not that be an amendment to the national defense act and so permit him to wear it daily? If we do that, does not the gentleman think there ought to be some distinctive mark for the officer as well as the man to show that he is not actually in the service?

Mr. McKENZIE. It seems to me, if we wish to do that, we should introduce a bill to amend section 125 of the national defense act, which covers this proposition; but we ought not to undertake to involve it in an amendment to the law which now permits soldiers and enlisted men to wear uniforms four months.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The amendment which the gentleman from Alabama has offered was offered in accordance with the suggestion that I made. I am inclined to think that my suggestion was an error, and for this reason: Each officer owns his uniform. If this bill should pass with this amendment, it apparently would restrict the officer to retaining one complete suit of outer uniform, when he may own several. If it applies to the officer, it apparently takes away from the officer the other uniforms he may have. I will say to my friend from Alabama that it seems to me clear that this ought not to apply to officers.

Mr. DENT. I do not quite agree with the gentleman's construction, but I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, and I will withdraw the amendment. I offered it at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I just asked the gentleman from Alabama if he would yield to me, and he said he would if he had the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama can not yield; he had five minutes, and he has exhausted the five minutes. The bill is being considered under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DOWELL: Page 1, line 6, after the word "overcoat" insert the word "shoes."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "present."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill, as it is presented, applies only to soldiers of the "present" war. It does not apply to those who served in the disturbance with Mexico, nor does it apply to Spanish War soldiers. We will, therefore, have the anomalous situation that soldiers serving in this war would be allowed to wear their uniforms, while those serving in the Mexican disturbance and who perhaps rendered as much service as some of the boys now being discharged will not be permitted to wear their uniforms. There are a few of us who served in the Spanish War who have our uniforms and would like to wear them on patriotic occasions.

I confess to a not wholly unselfish motive in offering the amendment, which would make it lawful for soldiers who served on the Mexican border or in the Spanish War to wear their old uniforms. I offer it on behalf of the Spanish War soldiers—of whom I was one—as well as others. I have got put away in a safe place an old blue uniform which I wore during the Spanish War, and if I should go to a soldiers' gathering, where other men who have served their country were permitted to wear their uniform and found that if I should put on my old blue uniform which I wore when a soldier I should be liable to be put in jail, I would feel very bad about it. As some one suggests, there are several moth holes in the uniform. I think it is only just that any soldier who has served his country in time of war and who has received an honorable discharge should be permitted to wear the uniform he brought home with him, even though it has a few moth holes in it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is the uniform which the gentleman wore in the Spanish-American War identical with the uniform that we have now in the Army?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The uniforms that we now use are khaki, and those old uniforms were blue.

Mr. McKENZIE. Then, of course, if anyone saw the gentleman wearing the old blue uniform of the Spanish-American War, he would not feel that the gentleman was impersonating a soldier of the United States at the present time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Oh, I can assure the gentleman that no Spanish-American War soldier wants to impersonate anyone but himself.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is aware of the fact that there is no law against wearing a uniform of the United States that is no longer the standard uniform.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Where it is a part of the official uniform, or where it so closely resembles it as to be mistaken for it, wearing it is against the law. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that the United States Guards who are now in service in this war wear the identical uniform that was formerly the uniform of the Regular Army of the United States. In fact, it is the old uniforms that the United States Guards are now wearing.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. QUIN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. QUIN. To make a few remarks on the gentleman's amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, the question that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has raised is not pertinent, because the object of this law which the chairman of the Military Committee has brought out on the floor is to give all persons who were in this late war a uniform, including his shoes, together with his socks and underclothing—one good complete uniform and overcoat, including his cap or hat, his helmet, and his gas mask, if he happened to have that, as a personal equipment. That is the intent of this bill. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] proposes to come up with a uniform in the Spanish War and wear that. Nobody objects to that. It is not a violation of the law, because that is not the uniform of this Government at the present time. I have no objection to the gentleman or any other veteran of the Spanish-American War, nor has the War Department any objection, to his wearing that uniform; but the object of this bill is to allow these men to wear these clothes until they wear them out. It saves in wool alone about $150,000,000 for the Army, and if you include the 600,000 men of the Navy in that, and no doubt a bill will be brought out from that committee to that effect, or an amendment offered to our bill, allowing them to wear their uniforms, you can see that as a question of economy it would be best for this bill to pass, allowing all of those men to wear those uniforms, because many hundreds of thousands of them will not be able to buy a suit of civilian clothing when they come out of the Army, because a wool suit, such as the uniforms are made of, at this time would cost a man $50.

The overcoat would cost him $50 to $75. Instead of these being turned into the scrap heap the individual soldier should be permitted to wear his uniform until he wears it out. If he does not like the khaki color he can have it dyed. Under the intent of this bill it is to be his personal, individual property, with permission to wear it until he wears it out.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is speaking for the committee, and I would like to ask him what the word "outer" means at the end of line 5. The gentleman says that it is the intention of the bill to keep a complete suit of clothing. The bill provides "one complete suit of outer uniform clothing."

Mr. QUIN. I will say to the gentleman that the War Department, in speaking before the committee, said he should keep his underclothing. Of course, his underclothes belong to him.

Mr. BARNHART. Why not strike out the word "outer"?

Mr. QUIN. I have no objection to striking out the word "outer." The intention of the War Department is that he shall have a complete outfit. If that soldier goes into a demobilizing camp and he has not a good uniform, the Government is going to give him a good one, a new one. That is the testimony before the committee. Our committee knowing that fact adopted the language of the department, in order that all of the soldiers, marines, and sailors will be given their uniforms and personal equipment to wear as long as they please in civil life.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to include the word "the" with the word "present" as being striken out, so that it will read, "United States Army in war," instead of "the war."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment by Mr. HUDDLESTON: Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "the present."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Huddleston amendment as modified.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDESTON] is required, but his mention of uniforms in connection with the Spanish War recalls an instance to me which is probably not worth narrating, although it casts some light upon the inefficiency of human organization. I had a brother who was in the Spanish War, who was returned to Montauk Point. I went there to meet him. He was in the hospital. I obtained a furlough for him so that I might take him to Atlantic City. When we came to go away I ascertained that he had worn a uniform throughout the campaign in Cuba and that just before he came home or just after he came home, and I think it was just before, a new uniform had been issued to him. There was considerable fear that disease might come in from Cuba with the boys, and very strict quarantine regulations were adopted on our part in this country, designed to prevent it. And this wise and wonderful regulation was in force at the time my brother was furloughed.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes; when I get through with this statement. He was required to give up the new uniform to be fumigated by the Government for fear it might have the lurking germs of disease in it but permitted to wear away the old uniform that he had worn all through Cuba without any fumigation at all. What a wonderful regulation that was. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ASWELL. I merely wish to ask the gentleman if he does not think the permission now given to wear the present uniform three months makes it exactly in line with his proposition?

Mr. MANN. Well, I confess I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. ASWELL. I mean to say that the gentleman rather criticizes the fact he wore the uniform after coming home from Cuba and he seemed to want to prevent them now from wearing the uniform——

Mr. MANN. I have not seemed to want to prevent that, notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana, who is seeking to advertise himself without any regard whatever for the boys, especially any more than other Members of the House, but sought to show that he was the only one who was interested in this when there were plenty of Members in the House who were interested in this subject.

Mr. ASWELL. But plenty of Members in the House did not object, as the gentleman from Illinois did.

Mr. MANN. I objected the other day to the gentleman's precipitating a resolution in here when I did not know what it contained, out of order, solely for advertising purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question——

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. In this connection. Mr. VESTAL, of Indiana, introduced a resolution with reference to this matter on the 21st of November, which, I think, was the first resolution introduced.

Mr. MANN. There was nobody in this House who was not interested in this subject, and no one here who did not intend that the boys should have an opportunity to wear their uniform and have them.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ASWELL. I merely wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that his personal remarks are entirely gratuitous and my concern was on the first day of the meeting of this Congress, and now is, to get these uniforms for these boys.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. DENT and others) there were—ayes 20, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MONDELL: At the end of line 2, page 2, strike out the period and insert "and all persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service should receive one month's extra pay on discharge."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that it is not germane.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "personal" insert the word "apparel."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to amend that by adding the word "and."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment of Mr. MONDELL: Page 1, line 7, after the word "personal" insert the words "apparel and."

The SPEAKER. So that it will read.

The CLERK. "And such articles of personal apparel and equipment as may be authorized," and so forth.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move——

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. DOWELL. The amendment just adopted, I think, covered the question of shoes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And socks.

The SPEAKER. That was adopted a few moments ago. The gentleman from North Dakota has offered an amendment, and he has been recognized to offer it. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "outer."

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested in and in favor of having some legislation enacted by Congress or some order issued by the War Department authorizing men who are discharged from the service to retain the uniforms and wearing apparel issued to them by the Government and permitting them to wear their uniforms with a suitable insignia indicating their discharge from the service. Last week I talked concerning this matter with a major general in charge of one of the sections of the War Department. He stated to me that practically the only objection the War Department had to permitting discharged soldiers to wear their uniforms in civil life was that it tended to affect the good discipline of the Army. It seems that when an officer in the service meets or passes a discharged soldier wearing the regular Army uniform he was unable to tell whether the discharged man should salute him or not. The general made it clear that officers do not desire enlisted men to salute them as a mere formality or as a personal matter, but as a practice which tends to aid in good discipline in the Army. Men in the service are required in passing to salute their superior officers. When men discharged from the service are allowed to wear the regular Army uniform it often causes much embarrassment to men in the service. I believe that the provisions in this bill providing that some insignia indicating the soldier's discharge be attached to the uniform will take care of the objections suggested by the general. I know from personal conversation with many men who have served in the Army during the war that, for sentimental as well as other reasons, they have a strong desire to retain possession of their old campaign uniforms and other wearing apparel that served them during the war. Their wish in this, it seems to me, should be granted without question or hesitation.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield to me right there? Does the gentleman have any objection to these soldiers having more than one suit of underwear? Has he any objection to their taking away more than one suit of underwear?

Mr. NORTON. My personal opinion and desire is that they should be allowed to have all the uniforms and wearing apparel issued to them by the Government.

Mr. TILSON. That is exactly what can be done if the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, and probably will be done by the War Department; but if the gentleman's amendment is passed, then the War Department must limit them to one suit of underwear. The gentleman is doing just the opposite to which he desires to accomplish.

Mr. NORTON. I do not believe that such would at all be the effect of my amendment.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman's amendment provides that the soldier may retain one complete suit of clothing. If the language of the law limits it to that, then he can not take any more. As it stands without the gentleman's amendment it would authorize one suit of outer clothing and such other articles of personal apparel as the War Department may see fit. The gentleman's limitation, cutting out the word "outer," will make it impossible for the War Department to give more than one suit of underwear.

Mr. NORTON. I do not believe that interpretation of my amendment is a right interpretation.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Have they not always kept their underwear?

Mr. McKENZIE. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the discharged soldier is not required to return his underwear?

Mr. NORTON. No; I am not fully informed on that.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is the fact.

The SPEAKER. The time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BARNHART: After the word "insignia," line 11, page 1, insert the words "to be uniform except as to length of service and."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, we could not hear it. I ask that it be read again.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment again.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have it reported to show how it will read as amended.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the section as it would read as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

So that as amended the lines will read:

"That the uniform above referred to shall include some distinctive mark or insignia to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, such mark or insignia to be uniform except as to length of service and to be issued by the War Department to all enlisted personnel so discharged."

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. BARNHART. I would like to make a statement first. But I will yield.

Mr. MANN. If we should add, as I suppose will be offered and I hope will be adopted, a provision for the Navy and Marine Corps, the gentleman would not have the same insignia for all of them?

Mr. BARNHART. If that should be amended, it could be amended in the same way as this.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it could be or not, if the House agreed to this amendment and if you insert the other. This could not be amended except by reconsideration.

Mr. BARNHART. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois grasps the intent of this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Yes, I do; namely, the same insignia for the Army as the Navy.

Mr. BARNHART. You get that information from the uniform that they wear. I have not any intention to interfere with any arrangement of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs or any amendment that he has prepared. The purpose, Mr. Speaker, of my introducing this amendment was to call the attention of the House to the fact that I have seen it reported in the newspapers that the War Department is preparing to issue a gold badge to the soldiers who have been called overseas and a silver badge to those who, unfortunately, did not get such service, because they did not get the order for it. I am inclined to believe that such a distinction between the fighting men of this country, many, many of them volunteers, who went in at the very beginning of the war and were detailed to duty that did not take them to France, would be a discrimination against the bravery and self-sacrifice of the soldiers who did volunteer, who were inducted, and who were drafted into the service at the beginning of the war, but were detailed to some duty in this country, whereby they could not get across. And yet many, many who have gone across have not seen the front trenches; have not seen any more of military life than those who have remained on this side, namely, the training camps, and such are to be brought back, according to the newspaper reports, and given a gold badge because they happened to be fortunate enough to be taken overseas.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield right there? The gentleman understands that the newspapers are not the Congress. No such bill has been reported.

Mr. BARNHART. This bill would fix that so that it could not be done, and I think it ought to be so done.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman will yield, I simply wish to ask the gentleman if he thinks his amendment will cure the evil of which he is now speaking?

Mr. BARNHART. I think it would.

Mr. McKENZIE. The fact of this insignia will only go to show that a man is an honorably discharged soldier, and will have nothing whatever to do with where he served, whether in this country or abroad, and of necessity they will all have to be alike. The way to reach the matter is to introduce a bill to prohibit.

Mr. BARNHART. This will prohibit.

Mr. McKENZIE. Oh, no.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman has not read the amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I yield.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does not the gentleman know that there is now in force among the enlisted men and officers a distinction in the way of a chevron that is worn on the arm?

Mr. BARNHART. That relates to length of service, and the amendment provides that that shall not be interfered with.

Mr. ROBBINS. The white color indicates service in this country and the other color indicates service abroad, and that is in force now under the regulations of the War Department. I do not think it is fair——

Mr. BARNHART. That is what this amendment would correct. It would put the fighting men who did not get to France on the same pedestal of honor as those who were ordered overseas. It would prevent discrimination that will send every soldier home with a heavy heart from unjust disappointment who was denied the possibility of being sent overseas.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be recognized in opposition to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana, if I may have his attention.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will give heed.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I sympathize thoroughly in the position that the gentleman takes on the question of silver and gold badges. I think it is a shame that there should be any distinction between the two. I do not think this program will be carried out. But I do not think the gentleman's amendment reaches that at all. The War Department now has full authority to issue service stripes, and it is doing it.

Mr. BARNHART. Do they do it by law?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes; absolutely. This does not change that in any way. This particular section of the bill, if it means anything, means that they are to put some mark on the uniform to show that the wearer was in the Army or in this war; nothing else; and that he was discharged. It will have nothing whatever to say about where he served, or how long he served, or whether he was black or white or anything else.

Mr. BARNHART. There would not be anything in the provisions of this bill to prevent them from sewing on that uniform a piece of gold or silver braid if the War Department under the provisions of this bill so decided.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There is nothing in this bill to do that.

Mr. BARNHART. But this amendment of mine would prevent that being done.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This has nothing whatever to do with the service stripes. The law is already in existence authorizing the Secretary of War to prescribe service stripes.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This has nothing to do with the service stripe. This pertains only to the service of the man in the Army.

Mr. BARNHART. It provides that the uniform should be marked with "insignia." What is "insignia"?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman could easily frame an amendment that would reach that, but his present amendment does not do it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BARNHART. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 57.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer several amendments in order to complete the text and make it apply to and embrace the Navy and Marine Corps. On page 1, line 3, after the word "Army," insert a comma and the words "Navy or Marine Corps."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire if the Coast Guard is included in the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. Insert the words "Navy and Marine Corps."

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PADGETT. The word "or" is correct after all. It is an alternative.

Mr. HICKS. Would not the gentleman from Tennessee be willing to include in his proposed amendment, in order to make it complete, the Coast Guard, as well as the Marine Corps and the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. The Coast Guard is serving with the Navy, and I believe it would be embraced in the word "Navy."

Mr. HICKS. We have to include it specifically, as I understand. It would not hurt the text to include it.

Mr. PADGETT. I will include it, then.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, may I make an inquiry of the gentleman?

Mr. PADGETT. I think the men of the Coast Guard are embraced under the word "Navy." They are serving with the Navy.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's amendment, but another query has arisen in my mind. The members of the Army Nurse Corps evidently ought not to be left out.

Mr. LOBECK. You would have to put on a red cross.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No. The Red Cross is distinct. If you are going to extend this to the Army and Navy and Marine Corps, let us not forget the women, who helped win the war. The hospital surgeon, who is a male, will get this privilege.

Mr. PADGETT. This says "any person." It does not say "male."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I know. But does a member of the Army Nurse Corps have the status of a person in the United States Army?

Mr. PADGETT. I think so.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to make his point of order?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the chairman of the Naval Committee if the Coast Guard is included in the word "Navy"?

Mr. PADGETT. I think so.

Mr. MANN. Those who are not connected with the Army and Navy should not be included.

Mr. WALSH. They are connected with it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts make the point of order?

Mr. WALSH. I have been trying to get information in order to determine whether I shall make the point of order or not, but I have been subjected to many interruptions. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if in his amendment he includes the Coast Guard?

Mr. PADGETT. The amendment, as I offered it, includes the Army and the Navy; and my present information is that the word "Navy" includes the Coast Guard, which is serving with the Navy during the war. I have no objection to including it specifically.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that a lighthouse keeper or a man on a lighthouse tender on Lake Michigan should receive this badge?

Mr. PADGETT. No; but during the war the men in the Coast Guard have been incorporated in the Navy and serving on the same ships.

Mr. MANN. The men in the Revenue-Cutter Service?

Mr. PADGETT. No. They have been going on naval ships.

Mr. MANN. But all lighthouse keepers on inland points have been connected in that sense with the Navy, because they are in the Coast Guard.

Mr. HICKS. The lighthouse keepers and men on lighthouse tenders are not members of the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. IGOE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. IGOE. I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been trying to find out for the last 10 minutes if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] wants to make the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. I have been trying to find out what this amendment is.

Mr. PADGETT. I have given the gentleman my opinion.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman's amendment does not include the Coast Guard.

Mr. PADGETT. I am willing to include that. If anyone wants to amend that, I am willing. I will include the words "Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard."

Mr. MANN. I will amend it. There is no reason for including in this service a lot of men who never were in any way connected with the war. A lot of the Coast Guard were not in any way connected with the war. What do you want to cheapen the whole thing for by putting in everybody?

Mr. PADGETT. I will offer the amendment, "Navy or Marine Corps." I have done the best I can under the circumstances.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman pardon me for an interruption for a moment?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to say, for the benefit of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], that if the Coast Guard men are a part of the Navy, they will be included in the amendment; and if not, they will not be included. The officer of the War Department who appeared before our committee was asked if the Army nurses would be included, and he stated they would be covered by this bill that we were considering. I do not think there is any doubt about it, because they are a branch or a part of the Military Establishment.

Mr. POU. Those not in the Navy ought not to be put in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee has modified his amendment so that my point of order would not apply.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was objecting to the taking in of Coast Guard or Lighthouse Service, and immediately the gentleman from Tennessee withdrew that part of his amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, my amendment applies only to the Navy or the Marine Corps.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts make this point of order?

Mr. WALSH. No, Mr. Speaker; I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on this amendment.

The SPEAKER. On which side?

Mr. IGOE. I am on both sides. [Laughter.] Let me ask the gentleman from Tennessee if the amendment includes the Naval Reserve?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; because it served in the Navy under existing law.

Mr. IGOE. Here is a peculiar situation. I have had this experience. I think this question is of importance to 600,000 men serving in the Navy. The Regular Navy is composed of men in the Regular Service, who enlisted before the war, men who enlisted in the Regular Service after the war began for a period of four years, and men who enlisted during the war for the period of the war.

Under regulations that have been sent out by the Bureau of Navigation that I have read, and concerning which I have had conferences with the officials of the Navy Department, it is held that men who enlisted in the regular service after the beginning of the war for a period of four years can not receive an honorable discharge until they have finished the four years' service. The man who enlisted during the war for the period of the war and is now discharged under regulations does not receive an honorable discharge, because he has not completed the period of his enlistment, because technically the war is not ended. The man in the Naval Reserve Force can not be discharged, because he has not completed the period of his enlistment. Those men are not discharged, but are put back on the inactive list.

This shows how difficult it is to draw a bill on the floor of the House when you have so many different classes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have been advised that the Navy Department has issued orders to the officers to discharge 20 per cent of the Naval Reserve Force and 10 per cent of the four-years men. Does the gentleman say they do not get an honorable discharge?

Mr. IGOE. That is my understanding, that no man in the Naval Reserve Force can get a discharge until he serves seven years, or whatever it is. He is put on the inactive list.

In this bill men getting an honorable discharge get certain privileges. In the Regular Navy this situation obtains, that the man who does not get the honorable discharge does not have his transportation paid; that is, as far as the Regular Navy is concerned. The Naval Reserve Force does have transportation paid.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Certainly.

Mr. ROSE. What becomes of the boy who enlisted after the war began and is furloughed, receives no pay, no mileage, no subsistence, and no possibility of discharge? What is the gentleman's understanding in such a case?

Mr. IGOE. My understanding is that there is a law which prevents paying transportation of a man enlisted in the Regular Navy discharged before the period of his enlistment expires.

Mr. ROSE. I have a young man in mind who enlisted for the period of the war, and the recruiting officer told him that it made no difference whether he enlisted for 4 years or 40 years, he would be given his transportation on his discharge and be treated like all other discharged soldiers.

Mr. IGOE. Notwithstanding that the Navy Department, as far as men enlisted for the period of the war, while they may be discharged under the regulation, they have not completed their contract, because the war is not ended by a declaration of peace.

Mr. ROSE. And they will be allowed no subsistence, transportation, nor refund for cost of uniforms?

Mr. IGOE. I do not know anything about the subsistence, but I am told that they are not given transportation, but there is some method whereby they may be sent into the Naval Reserve.

Mr. ROSE. Are these boys allowed anything for the money that they spent for their clothing?

Mr. IGOE. I am not able to answer the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. IGOE. I ask for three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say that about the middle of last week I called up the department and asked about the discharge of a young man from the Navy, and they said they could not discharge him; that he had better ask to be put on the inactive list.

Mr. IGOE. What I am talking about is not transportation; that can be taken up later; but here you are providing certain benefits for men who get an honorable discharge. The man who enlisted in the Navy during the war, whether for a four-year period or for the war, who has rendered honorable and efficient service—some have been 15 months in the war zone on destroyers—can not get an honorable discharge, and under this bill as it is now worded I do not see how these men could get any benefit from the act.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. If they get any discharge at all, it will be an honorable discharge.

Mr. IGOE. But they do not get any discharge at all; they are given a release certificate of some sort. There ought to be some appropriate language in the bill to take care of that situation.

Mr. HARDY. I think there ought to be a bill carefully drawn to take care of that case.

Mr. IGOE. I am going to vote for this bill, because it will benefit somebody.

Mr. LOBECK. How about the young men in these training schools?

Mr. IGOE. I do not think they will come under this bill.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, if they are put on the inactive service they retain their uniforms, do they not, if not discharged?

Mr. IGOE. The uniforms are returned, as I understand it, to the Navy Department.

Mr. PLATT. Not while they are still in the service, whether inactive or active.

Mr. IGOE. I am not sure about that, but I think that when they are returned to the inactive list they turn in their uniforms.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer that question, if the gentleman will permit.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recognized for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. On which side is the gentleman?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Like my friend here, I am on both sides. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not have to ask for unanimous consent. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman that last week I called up and asked about the discharge of a certain young man in the Navy. I was told they could not discharge him, but that if the young man would ask to be placed on the inactive list they could grant that, and then he would not have to return $100 worth of uniform.

Mr. PLATT. Exactly.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But that if he was discharged he would have to return $100 worth of uniform. They said that they could not discharge him, but they could put him on the inactive list.

Mr. PLATT. That brings out what I had in mind. If he goes on the inactive list he does receive the benefit of this act.

Mr. IGOE. What I was complaining about was that a man can not be discharged. Why should a man be obliged to go on the inactive list if they make regulations for the discharge of some, which they do, or for letting them out of the service, and they are separated from the service—men in the Regular Navy who have enlisted during the war?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, if that is in order. I have just come in. I do not know what has preceded. This bill seems to cover the Army, and, as I understand it, an amendment is now offered to perfect it by something that would include the Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. And the Marine Corps.

Mr. CANNON. And the Marine Corps. I have a case in mind in my own town where a young man is in the naval training station who is anxious to get his discharge so that he can care for those who are dependent upon him and take up the burdens of civil life. It seems to me that we have really no right to take this class of men and continue them in the inactive service. They ought to go out of the service. I do not know how far this bill goes in doing complete justice to the Army, but it seems to me that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, ought to treat the matter separately and report a bill, which he would know how to report, that will give relief where it ought to be given, and let these young men who are in the Navy understand they are to be discharged—that they are to be divorced entirely from the service—so that they can know what their status is.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, this bill does not deal with the question of discharges at all. It merely provides for uniforms and allowing the men to wear their uniforms, and to provide that certain insignia shall distinguish that uniform, showing that the man wearing it is retired from active service. It does not relate to discharges from the Army, the Navy, or the Marine Corps. It is not intended for that or drawn for that purpose. It relates only to allowing them to wear their uniforms.

Mr. CANNON. Is there legislation in contemplation to divorce these young men who are, for instance, in the naval training schools, so that they can be discharged and go back to civil life with some assurance that they can make some arrangements to make a living without a liability to be called back into the naval service?

Mr. PADGETT. I can explain the matter to the gentlemen. In the Navy we have three lines of service. We have the regular service and we have a temporary service in the Regular Navy and then we have a Naval Reserve. The Naval Reserve are composed of men in civil life, carrying on their occupations, who enrolled in this Naval Reserve under a stipulation that they would train for one month during the time for which they were to receive regular pay and remain in civil employment, but in case of war or national emergency, proclaimed by the President, they could be called into active duty. When the war came on the President did call the Naval Reserve into active duty. When in active duty they have the same rating and the same pay as the Regular Navy, but when the necessity for their active service ceases they simply go back into the reserves, because that is the regular organization in which they enlisted in time of peace, and they have gone identically into the status in which they were and in which they enrolled in time of peace.

Then there is a temporary increase in the Navy, and the law provides that they shall be disbanded whenever Congress so directs, or when the President shall direct, or in no event later than six months after the declaration of peace. The law already provides for it. There are numbers of applications, and the Secretary has directed a very liberal interpretation of the rules, but it is provided, however, that the young men who are in the reserve, if they want to be released from active duty and go back to the status in which they were when they went into the service in time of peace, shall be permitted to do so, and they receive their transportation back to their homes where they enlisted.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes. I want to ask some additional questions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. What I want to get at is this: In the training station in Chicago, near Chicago, there are many thousands of men. I have many constituents who, I understand, have enlisted in the regular service and are there for training. Now, what is to become of them?

Mr. PADGETT. Some of them, where they present cases—proper cases—are being released. The gentleman will understand there are men in the reserve, there are men in the temporary organization and there are men in the permanent organization. Now, those who are in the reserve, when they present a proper claim or application, it is granted, and they go back home into civil life just as they were before they went into the service.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that. Now, take the next case.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, the next case are the temporary ones. If they present a proper case, they are discharged. They are not in the regular service; they are not in the permanent service; hence, the only thing is to keep them or discharge them, and they are discharged; but in the regular Navy there are only two cases in which that could be done—either to keep them or to discharge them. Now, there are three methods of enlistment—enrollment, provided for four years; that is, in the reserve, and is called enrollment. In the temporary Navy and in the permanent Navy they enlist, and the law provides that he may enlist for four years or for the war, or for such shorter time as the President may provide. Most of them enlisted for four years. That is their contract with the Government where they have enlisted for four years. A few enlisted for the war. Whenever the war officially ends their enlistment ends. The President never directed, as I am informed, any other term of enlistment except the war or the four years. He did not provide for any six months or a year or two years, or anything of that kind.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask for five minutes more in order to explain these matters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. I have many requests from constituents where enlistment was in one of the two classes referred to, where they have been in training, and they never received any other service.

Mr. PADGETT. All three of them are in these schools. All three services send men to the training schools.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman think some legislation is necessary to enable these men who desire to get out of the service, whether for the four years or for the war, and let them go back and pick up their duties in private life?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not think there is any legislation necessary. The Secretary is doing it very rapidly, just as fast as the service will permit. We could not pass legislation here and provide just for emptying the whole thing out without regard to a proper care and preservation of the status of the Navy on an efficient basis.

Mr. CANNON. I have been referred by the department here, in many cases, that it is to be taken up in the training schools——

Mr. PADGETT. In order to expedite it the Secretary has given authority to the commanding officers at all naval stations in proper cases——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. PADGETT. To grant these releases.

Mr. CANNON. What is a proper case?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the question I desired to ask, What is a proper case? I have many inquiries.

Mr. PADGETT. The Secretary has indicated where young men wanted to return to complete their education that favorable consideration should be given. He has indicated that in cases of urgent family reasons, if there are any extraordinary and particular family reasons why they should return, if persons are sick or conditions have changed. A large discretion is given.

Mr. CANNON. He is to be recommended by the sailor's commanding officer?

Mr. PADGETT. He does not have to be recommended, the commanding officer is given authority to act.

Mr. RUCKER. Suppose he will not do it.

Mr. PADGETT. Then he can take it up with the department here.

Mr. RUCKER. And then he has to take it up again back there?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know about that.

Mr. KING. Suppose their applications were torn up by the officers, as has been the case——

Mr. PADGETT. I think we would hear from the department if they were torn up.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. PADGETT. I have a number of amendments to offer to this one if agreed to.

Mr. RUCKER. May I have the gentleman's attention?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. RUCKER. I have no doubt the discourse the gentleman has just given the House is perfectly intelligible to those who understand the affairs pertaining to the Navy, but to me it is just Greek. I have a letter from a constituent wanting to be discharged. He enlisted for the term of the war. I took it up with the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Navy says, "Take it to the commanding officer." You take it to the commanding officer, and he says take it to some other commanding officer [laughter], and the result is you can not get it. Now, as I understood the gentleman's statement here a moment ago during the course of which he used the words "proper occasion" about a proper number of times, and that the proper occasion is when there is some emergency in a family, probably birth or death or about to be one or the other or both, and then they can ask to be discharged to go to school——

Mr. PADGETT. Or an important industry.

Mr. RUCKER. If he has a certificate showing he is a schoolboy, or something in reference to a severe condition in the family.

Mr. PADGETT. No, no.

Mr. RUCKER. That is what the gentleman said.

Mr. PADGETT. The Navy has been very liberal. Those are just general details of the matter, and hundreds and hundreds of boys are being discharged every day, and they are being allowed to go home if they are in the reserve under what is called inactive duty.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman will pardon me. The country thinks the war is over. The families who gave their husbands and their children to fight this war are now clamoring to get them home, and it looks to me as if they are going to be kept indefinitely.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman must realize that with the vast organization of the Navy and the vast importance of maintaining that organization you can not just simply dismiss men ad hominem ad scatterandum and just throw them off the ships. You have got to maintain the organization.

Mr. RUCKER. You can mobilize them and bunch them, but you do not seem to be able to demobilize them.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman state how many have been discharged since the armistice was signed?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman has made the statement that a great many have been discharged.

Mr. PADGETT. The Secretary told me he was discharging them rapidly.

Mr. HASTINGS. And you have no information as to the number?

Mr. PADGETT. I have not.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the floor. I have lost it.

Mr. DOWELL. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOWELL. I have had the information, coming from some of the boys at the Great Lakes Station, that the officers there refused to consider their applications for release, and tell the boys that they do not intend to consider them for several months. Does the gentleman have any information about that?

Mr. PADGETT. Not as to those particular things there. But it is a direct contradiction of what the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation and the Secretary told me, and it is in direct opposition to what the printed circular that I have seen says, namely, that instructions are given to discharge the boys, and the Secretary told me he had given instructions to discharge——

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor.

Mr. DOWELL. I have the floor.

Mr. RUCKER. You took it away from me, and I think I should take it back.

Mr. PADGETT. The Secretary told me he had given instructions to discharge 20 per cent.

Mr. DOWELL. One other matter, Mr. Speaker. The department advised me they have nothing to do with the discharge of the boys from the service, but it is entirely in the hands of the officers at the Great Lakes Station. They say they have given general instructions and the officers there can act upon these applications. The department here will not consider the applications for discharge.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield? I wanted to try to help the gentleman if I could——

Mr. DOWELL. My time is going on here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DOWELL. One other matter. A young man was in the city not over two days ago and advised me——

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SISSON. I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. DOWELL. If the gentleman wants to take up the time of the House to call the roll, he may do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order. The Speaker will count to see if there is a quorum present. [After counting.] One hundred and five gentlemen are present; not a quorum.

Mr. DENT. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 284 Members—a quorum—have answered to their names.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have the privilege to revise and extend my remarks on the bill which was discussed in the House a few days ago to increase the salaries of judges.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the bill to increase the salaries of judges. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SLAYDEN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for three days on account of important business.

RETENTION OF UNIFORM AND PERSONAL EQUIPMENT.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time I have?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, as I was just about to state, a couple of men, who are engineers and who enlisted in the service for the war, advised me a few days ago that they were being held in a work that was not necessary for war work, but were engaged on construction work by the Navy Department, and they were working as privates, being held there with men who were receiving $6, $8, or $10 per day, and that they were unable to get any consideration whatever of their applications for discharge. Does the gentleman know anything about that situation?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I know nothing about individual cases; but the Secretary has issued regulations providing for the discharge of men and has given authority to the commandants of the various yards and stations to grant discharges, and has indicated certain lines where he thought they ought to be granted—men in important industry, and for family reasons, and to complete their education—and I have been told that numbers and numbers of them are being released. But I do not know about individual cases.

Mr. DOWELL. But, Mr. Speaker, what I am complaining about this is: I know that there is a general order, but I also know that many of the men in the Navy and in the Army are making applications where it is imperative that they be relieved, and I do know that their applications are receiving slow consideration by the commanding officers, and I know that the departments here are not considering these applications but advising that the commanding officers are authorized to grant these releases. It occurs to me that both the Navy and the War Departments should make every possible effort to release these young men who have enlisted for the war, where a clear showing is made that they are needed at home, either for industrial or other good reasons, and especially where they have dependents.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina objects. All these pro forma amendments are withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it up. The Chair will remind the gentleman that there is an amendment pending. Is this an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Let us get through with the Padgett amendment first. The Clerk will report the Padgett amendment again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "Army," insert "Navy or Marine Corps."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have several amendments perfecting the verbiage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is willing that the gentleman from Tennessee go ahead, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. WALSH. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. PADGETT. On page 1, line 7, after the word "authorized," insert the word "respectively."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. In line 8, after the comma after the word "War," insert "or the Secretary of the Navy."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. In line 11 of page 1, after the word "prescribed" and before the word "by," insert the word "respectively."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. In the same line, after the word "War," insert "or the Secretary of the Navy."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. On page 2, line 1, after the word "issued," insert the word "respectively."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. On page 2, line 1, after the word "Department," insert "or Navy Department."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Another amendment is pending. The Clerk will report.

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold my amendment, Mr. Speaker. I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] wishes to submit something.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I offered an amendment to add the word "shoes" after the word "overcoat," in line 6 of the bill. Subsequently the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] offered an amendment, which included the personal effects and which made this amendment unnecessary. The amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming covers all that was intended to be covered by this amendment. I therefore move to reconsider the vote whereby my amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to reconsider the vote whereby his amendment was adopted. The question is on agreeing to his motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOWELL. The amendment now is before the House, and I want to say this word: The purpose of this amendment was to include shoes with the uniform. It has now been suggested to me that by adding the word "shoes" it is limited to one pair, and, as I am advised, I think all of the boys have issued to them more than one pair of shoes. I think all of them have two pairs of shoes at least. Under the provisions of the Mondell amendment the War Department may issue to them the shoes that they think are necessary, and I am in favor of giving them whatever they are entitled to receive under their assignment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, insert at the end of the line the following: "the word 'Navy' shall include the officers and enlisted personnel of the Coast Guard who have served in the Navy during the present war."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, before that is done I would like to propose an amendment by way of a new section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do so if the gentleman from Alabama will withhold his motion.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to the gentleman from Michigan offering his amendment, and I withhold my motion for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 1 add a new section, as follows, to stand as section 2:

"SEC. 2. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all such private soldiers and sailors honorably discharged since April 6, 1917, and in cases where such clothing and uniforms have been restored to the Government on their discharge the same or similar clothing and uniform in kind and value as near as may be shall be returned and given to such soldiers and sailors."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, well, then.

The SPEAKER. And the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I rose to be recognized before the vote was taken, but now I would like to amend the language of the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The Smith amendment has been adopted.

Mr. FRENCH. I ask unanimous consent to have that amendment, if it is too late now to amend it, adopted so that the language will be changed from "soldiers and sailors"——

The SPEAKER. But the Smith amendment has been adopted. If the gentleman from Alabama will withhold his motion, the gentleman from Idaho can move to amend. The gentleman from Alabama has moved the previous question.

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the section just adopted by striking out the words "soldiers and sailors" and inserting the words "persons who served in the United States Army or Navy or Marine Corps in the present war."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SISSON. I understood that a division was demanded on the Smith amendment, and I think the House generally understood it.

The SPEAKER. Who demanded the division?

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] demanded a division.

The SPEAKER. But the amendment was carried.

Mr. SISSON. I think the House did not realize that the Smith amendment had been adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan demanded a division under the impression, I suppose, that his amendment had been defeated. The Member whose side carries has no right to demand a division.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question that ruling, Mr. Speaker. Sometimes a Member wants to see how large his amendment carries.

The SPEAKER. Suppose he does. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RAGSDALE. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. As a matter of fact, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] withdrew his request for a division and that settled the proposition without regard to any other.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this observation. I hope the statement just made by the Chair may not stand as a ruling for this reason, if the Chair will permit: A gentleman may demand a division on his amendment which has carried, and if the Chair holds that he has no right to demand it, other gentlemen who are against it, relying on his having demanded a division, may fail to demand it, and then they have lost their rights. The House, as some gentlemen say in this instance—I was not myself—was misled by the fact that the gentleman from Michigan demanded a division.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Tennessee is correct.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The House was in considerable confusion, and I submit that in all fairness to the House there ought to be a division on that proposition.

Mr. MANN. A motion to reconsider is in order.

Mr. DENT. I move to reconsider the vote whereby the Smith amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to reconsider the vote whereby the Smith amendment was agreed to.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRENCH. Now, Mr. Speaker, may my motion be considered as pending?

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be recognized for two minutes to make a brief statement about this amendment. In my judgment, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan is unwise. It will involve the War Department in endless confusion, and it will be impossible to carry it out. If the gentleman from Michigan desires to get at some concrete proposition for the benefit of deserving soldiers and sailors who have been discharged, let him offer an amendment that they shall be given in money or some equivalent to that which would be required to purchase a uniform from the Government. Any such proposition I would favor, for I want equal justice granted to all enlisted men.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I insist upon my motion for the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, this amendment as drawn will not permit the issuing of uniforms to sergeants and corporals; neither will it permit the issuance of uniforms to discharged men in the Marine Corps. It is crudely drawn, and in its present shape it should not be adopted.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I insist upon my motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] wanted to offer an amendment. The question is on the Smith amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would like a few moments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I think that a man who enlisted and who has been honorably discharged since the beginning of the war is entitled to the benefits of this bill. They all offered their lives and services for their country and for the same purpose. They fought as only American soldiers can fight. They marched, slept, and lived in their uniforms. Their uniform was the one thing that was always with them. Many of them have been discharged since war was declared, and if there is one thing for which they have an attachment more than another it is their uniforms and the insignia they wore during their service. It occurs to me to be unjust, it occurs to me to be unfair, that a person who has served heretofore and who has been discharged before this bill can become a law shall be deprived of the benefit—the small benefit—carried by this bill. Their uniform and clothing are not of supreme value to the country. It will not carry much of any appropriation. But the uniform and the insignia worn by the soldier at the time of his discharge are prized highly by him and by rights ought to be kept by him and belong to him. There is not any reason why a person who has handed in his uniform or sent it back to the Government before the bill becomes a law, who was discharged since we declared war on the 6th day of April, 1917, should not have a uniform under the same regulation that a person gets his uniform after this bill becomes a law. This amendment provides that if the Government can not furnish the soldier the specific uniform that he had when he was discharged it should furnish him a uniform of like kind and value as worn by himself and as given up by him at the time of his discharge as near as may be. So that all of these soldiers who were honorably discharged since war was declared may be treated fairly. What is the use of discriminating as between a soldier who was discharged last week and one who is discharged this week. It is unfair to these boys.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I had intended that my amendment should be regarded as pending, and if it is not I should like to offer it again.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENT. Is not the motion I made in order for the previous question? I have the floor for the purpose of making that motion, and I yielded only for the purpose of allowing the amendment to be offered and voted on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Alabama was willing to let the gentleman from Idaho offer his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to his offering the amendment to the amendment, but I want the previous question to be put.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, my amendment is at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Amend the Smith amendment by striking out in line 2 the following: "Such private soldiers and sailors honorably discharged since April 6, 1917," and insert in lieu thereof: "persons who served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps during the present war."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KAHN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KAHN. To offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho. Instead of the word "persons" I suggest that he use the language "enlisted men."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman offer that as an amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will accept that amendment to include all enlisted men.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has no right to accept the amendment.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I had intended in the language I propose——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama agreed to permit the gentleman to offer his amendment before he moved the previous question, but he insisted there should be no debate. The question is on the French amendment to the Smith amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Smith amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMITH of Michigan) there were—ayes 51, noes 68.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. This is an automatic call. The question is on the Smith amendment as amended.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, may we have the amendment again reported?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENT. I understood that the Smith amendment had been disposed of, and I rose to make the motion for the previous question. I understood the Chair to put that question when the point of no quorum was made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair never put the motion for the previous question.

Mr. DENT. The vote on the Smith amendment had been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. That is true, but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] was up making the point of order that there was no quorum present.

Mr. DENT. After I had made the motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Oh, the gentleman made the motion for the previous question half an hour ago. It is only fair to give the gentleman from Massachusetts a chance. The question is on the Smith amendment as amended. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, may we have the Smith amendment again reported?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be again reported as amended.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Smith amendment as amended.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I thought an amendment had been accepted by the gentleman from Michigan to change the word "persons" to enlisted men," as suggested by the gentleman from California?

The SPEAKER. It never was accepted. The gentleman from Michigan had no power to accept the amendment. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 250, nays 35, answered "present" 2, not voting 145, as follows:

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, as to the amendment that I offered a while ago and that was declared carried, the Clerk in reading was under a different apprehension than I was. I intended to strike out merely the words "such private soldiers and sailors," and not the words "honorably discharged since April 6, 1917." Now, I would like to ask unanimous consent that those words, "honorably discharged since April 6, 1917," be retained in the bill.

It was not in my mind to strike these words out, but in making the amendment from the floor the Clerk understood I intended to include them with the other words of my amendment. Many men have voted no on this amendment under the apprehension that that was really what I intended, and therefore they were against it. I would like to ask unanimous consent that those words be inserted in the proper place they were in the bill.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. When that is done, which would really make the amendment somewhat better, then you put in an improper light every man on this floor who has voted nay against this amendment in the shape that it was in.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I voted against this amendment because it did not have the words that it is now proposed to put in. If those words had been there, I would have voted yea. Therefore I object.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. FIELDS. To submit a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a motion, then. I offer as an amendment——

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is a man in this House that would have voted against the amendment had it carried the language that the gentleman has asked to have reinstated in the bill. I ask unanimous consent that that language be restored to the bill and that the roll call just had be vacated.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FRENCH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to insert, following the words of my amendment, "present war," the words "honorably discharged since April 6, 1917."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] yield for that purpose?

Mr. DENT. Yes; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. It is too late to offer an amendment to this amendment unless it is reconsidered, because the amendment has been agreed to by the House.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. FRENCH. I am offering it to the section as amended.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], the chairman of the committee, who made the motion for the previous question, will yield for the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] to offer an amendment, the Chair will not object to it.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield for that purpose.

Mr. DENT. I yield.

Mr. FRENCH. I move to amend by inserting the words "honorably discharged since April 6, 1917," following the words of my amendment adopted a while ago.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it, and everybody will please give attention.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: After the words "present war" insert "honorably discharged since April 6 1917."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the amendment is not in order. The Smith amendment as amended was agreed to by the House. It is too late to amend that by changing anything in it.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FRENCH, Mr. WOODS of Indiana, and Mr. SCOTT of Michigan rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Idaho rise?

Mr. FRENCH. I want to move to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not move to recommit now.

Mr. FRENCH. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the Smith amendment was adopted.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor for the purpose of making a motion for the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto. I yielded for the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] to offer this amendment, and as a point of order is sustained on it I insist on my motion at this time.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. DOWELL. On a question of order. The gentleman had the floor and has a perfect right to make the motion to reconsider. He was yielded the floor. The Speaker gave him the floor and he made the motion to reconsider, which is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] yielded to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] to offer an amendment, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made a point of order that the amendment was not in order. The Chair sustained it.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think a motion to reconsider is privileged under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was trying to get to it. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] moves to reconsider the vote by which the Smith amendment as amended by a piece of his amendment was agreed to. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. FRENCH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have my amendment offered to include the words "honorably discharged since April 6, 1917," following the language as originally adopted, as I proposed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it. We do not want to get into any more muddles about this Smith amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Strike out of the Smith amendment the following: "such private soldiers and sailors" and insert "honorably discharged since April 6, 1917."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be reported as it will read if this amendment be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all persons who served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps during the present war honorably discharged since April 6, 1917, and in cases where such clothing and uniforms have been restored to the Government with their discharge, the same or similar clothing and uniforms in kind and value, as near as may be, shall be returned and given to such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the committee, as to whether the words "honorably discharged" will be sufficient to cover every case desired by the House. My information is that there is a difference between an honorable discharge and a discharge which may come about upon the request of the person in the service. I have in mind the case of a young man serving in the United States Navy who was offered a commission in the Army and who made application for discharge from the Navy. He was granted the discharge on the 6th day of November. The armistice came before he could be commissioned in the Army. He was out of the naval service, but he did not receive an honorable discharge. He received what is called a discharge upon request, showing faithful service and a good rating. But under the amendment as proposed, or under this bill, he would not be permitted the privileges accorded by this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman making a speech or is he asking a question? [Laughter.]

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Both. I desire information from the chairman upon the question.

Mr. DENT. I can not answer that question. I am not familiar with the regulations of the Navy, but I understand the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs explained that fully to-day.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. No; he did not.

Mr. DENT. He was on the floor about an hour, and I think he answered all questions propounded to him.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. He did not cover that.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken a verbal amendment ought to be made at the end of the bill, where it says "discharged soldier or sailor." We ought to add "and marine." It says "Army and Navy and Marine Corps," but in the last passage it says simply for the "sailors and soldiers," but does not include marines. The marines ought to be included in that expression. Let the Clerk read the last words there. It also should include the Coast Guard, but that is not necessary. The bill provides that they shall be considered a part of the Navy.

Mr. KAHN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. KAHN. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask the same privilege.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a motion to amend the amendment by adding the words "and marines" at the end.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Padgett amendment.

The Padgett amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Smith amendment as modified by the French amendment.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, would an amendment now be in order to the French amendment?

The SPEAKER. No. That would be an amendment in the third degree. The question is on the Smith amendment as modified by the French amendment and as modified by the Padgett amendment.

Mr. WALSH. The Padgett amendment has not been adopted.

The SPEAKER. Yes. The question is on agreeing to the Smith amendment as modified by the French amendment and the Padgett amendment.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, when was the French amendment to the Smith amendment adopted?

The SPEAKER. About three or four minutes ago.

Mr. WALSH. No. I think the Chair will find it was not.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the French amendment as modified by the Padgett amendment.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I think the Padgett amendment does not apply to my amendment, but to the language of the Smith amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division on the French amendment.

The SPEAKER. A division on the French amendment is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 155, noes 0.

So the French amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Smith amendment as amended.

The Smith amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the title of the bill be amended in conformity with the text.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the title of the bill be amended so as to conform to the text. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. DENT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GARNER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, for one week, on account of illness.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. This is Unanimous Consent Calendar day, and the Clerk will call the first bill.

INTEREST ON CHEROKEE JUDGMENTS.

The first business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 357) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, consider, and determine certain claims of the Cherokee Nation against the United States.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, let us have the bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear, consider, and determine the claim of the Cherokee Nation against the United States for interest, in addition to all other interest heretofore allowed and paid, alleged to be owing from the United States to the Cherokee Nation on the funds arising from the judgment of the Court of Claims of May 18, 1905 (40 Ct. Cls. Rept., p. 252), in favor of the Cherokee Nation. The said court is authorized, empowered, and directed to carefully examine all laws, treaties, or agreements, and especially the agreement between the United States and the Cherokee Nation of December 19, 1891, ratified by the United States March 3, 1893 (27 Stat. L., p. 640, sec. 10), in any manner affecting or relating to the question of interest on said funds, as the same shall be brought to the attention of the court by the Cherokee Nation under this act. And if it shall be found that under any of the said treaties, laws, or agreements interest on one or more of the said funds, either in whole or in part, has not been paid and is rightfully owing from the United States to the Cherokee Nation, the court shall render final judgment therefor against the United States and in favor of the Cherokee Nation, either party to have the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States as in other cases. The said claim shall be presented within one year after the passage of this act by petition in the Court of Claims by the Cherokee Nation as plaintiff against the United States as defendant, and the petition shall be verified by the attorney employed to prosecute said claim by the Cherokee Nation acting through its principal chief. A copy of the petition shall be served upon the Attorney General of the United States, and he, or some attorney from the Department of Justice to be designated by him, is hereby directed to appear and defend the interests of the United States in said cause. The law and practice and rules of procedure in said courts shall be the practice and law in this case. The attorney for the Cherokee Nation shall be paid the fee as stipulated in his contract of employment, not to exceed 15 per cent on the gross amount, if any, that shall be recovered for said Cherokee Nation. The amounts recovered for said Cherokee Nation, if any, except the fee to said attorney, shall be disbursed under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior to the parties entitled thereto in the manner prescribed by the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, as I understand, the claims involved in this bill amount in the neighborhood of about half a million dollars. Apparently the bill provides that the attorney who prosecutes a case under it in the Court of Claims shall receive 15 per cent of the amount which the court may award. As I understand the bill, it is largely a matter, perhaps not exactly of accounting, but almost accounting; a matter to be decided by the records now in existence. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] think that attorneys, for presenting a record case to be decided by the existing records, not lengthy, ought to receive a fee of $50,000 or $60,000?

Mr. HASTINGS. In answer to what the gentleman says, I will say that this involves an accounting of four items. Three of the items are very small, and if they were to find with the Cherokee Nation on three of the four items, then the fee would be practically nothing.

But, in further answer to what the gentleman says, I will say I have prepared an amendment to leave the fixing of the fee to the Court of Claims, so that the court would fix the fee.

I have also in the amendment provided that the maximum shall not be greater than 10 per cent. But 10 per cent on three of the items would be a very inconsiderable fee. Of course, if they were to find for the nation on all the four items and for the full amount claimed, that would be a reasonable fee. Anyway, I have an amendment which it is my purpose to offer allowing the Court of Claims to fix the fee, not to exceed the amount of 10 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not have the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is generally conceded by anyone who has examined the report of the two bills covering the four items, and especially H. R. 4699, containing two of the items which the gentleman introduced, which was formerly on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, that there is owing to the Cherokees the sum of $27,500. That is virtually conceded by the department. As to items 2 and 3, which involve the amount of $478,000, of course the gentleman agrees that 10 per cent would be an outrageous fee for a small accounting, as has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois. Ten per cent of $27,500 would allow the attorney who has been working up these claims ever since they were adjudicated by the Court of Claims, and passed on by that court and by the Supreme Court, a liberal fee for an ordinary attorney working up claims against the Government.

Mr. HASTINGS. The amendment which I propose to offer provides that the attorney shall be paid such fee as the Court of Claims thinks reasonable and proper. It is not to be in excess of the stipulated contract, not more than 10 per cent total, but any way it provides that the Court of Claims may fix the fee, and the amount shall not be in excess of 10 per cent.

Mr. MANN. Now, let us get down to brass tacks. I remember the bill very well in the previous Congress. An attorney has a contract now under which he is to receive 15 per cent of the amount collected. The Secretary of the Interior has recommended that a bill like this be passed; that we should provide that the contract for the attorney's service must be approved by him; and the old bill provided, or the Secretary recommended, I am not sure which, that the attorney's fees should be fixed by the court subject to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and fix the contract for attorney's fees not to exceed the amount in the contract. So that the attorney would have to receive the approval of the Secretary of the Interior as to the amount of the fee and also the approval of the court.

Now, when it comes to fixing attorneys' fees the court has usually only one side represented. In this case if the court makes an award to the Cherokee Nation, then comes the fixing of the attorney's fees, and there will be nobody in court on any side of the case except the attorney showing how great his services have been. He will have the contract for 15 per cent. Probably the court would allow him 10 per cent. I really think that a fee of $40,000 or $50,000 for presenting to the court simply a record in the case—and that is all that is to be presented practically, for the court to say whether a previous allowance by the court should have carried interest or not, or that the Government should have paid interest beyond a certain point, which it did—it seems to me that that is allowing a good deal. Of course, we know that we paid interest on these claims from 1812 or 1816, or something like that, and in one case the interest amounted to four or five times as much as the principal—I think they were very lucky to get the principal and still luckier to get four or five times as much in interest.

Mr. HASTINGS. The court decided it for us.

Mr. MANN. I understand. Now, it is proposed that we pay additional interest, but if that interest is to be paid it ought not to go to an attorney for practically doing nothing. I am willing that the attorney should receive a reasonable compensation.

Mr. HASTINGS. What would the gentleman suggest as an amendment? All I want is to be certain that he shall receive reasonable compensation.

Mr. MANN. I think it ought to be fixed by the court, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will permit, let me say that the affairs of the Cherokee Nation have been wound up.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman possibly misunderstood what I said. I know the Secretary of the Interior is desirous of contracting for attorneys' fees, but I did not say that, and I understand there is no way of making a new contract. That is one reason why it seems to me that somebody seeking to protect the interest of the Indians shall have something to say about the attorney's fees. Hence I would make the attorney's fees allowed by the court and approved by the Secretary.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman wants to offer an amendment to this amendment to that effect I will have no objection.

Mr. MANN. I have not prepared any amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then I will insert it in this amendment and provide that it shall be approved by the Court of Claims and the Secretary of the Interior, so that there can be no question but what we want only a fair and reasonable fee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask whether the gentleman was willing to accept an amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, in lines 24 and 25, striking out those lines and inserting in lieu thereof "under contract approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, as provided by law."

Mr. HASTINGS. The only objection to that is this: An attorney has investigated this question and has been at work at it for 10 or 15 years, and inasmuch as it is going to your own court, inasmuch as it simply submits the claim against the United States on behalf of the Indian tribe, certainly the Indians ought to have something to say as to whom they shall employ. Now, the Indians have employed an attorney who understands the questions involved——

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman means the chief has employed an attorney.

Mr. HASTINGS. Exactly; for and on behalf of the Indians, and the Indians themselves have ratified it in convention.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman have any objection to inserting after the word "chief" that same language?

Mr. HASTINGS. The chief is dead. There is no officer to act for the tribe. A contract has been made, and the man with whom this contract has been made is familiar with it. Let me say to you that he has given practically his life to this class of work, and he is more familiar with it than any other man I know. I am not trying to fix his fee. I am willing that the Court of Claims should fix it, or that the Secretary of the Interior shall approve it, but I do believe that a man who has given 20 or 25 years of service, first to the original claim when it was pending before the courts, who followed it through all of the courts, and who is familiar with it now, is better qualified to represent these Indians than some new attorney that may be brought in.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman that language that will provide for the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will have it in a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, early in this session there was this bill and H. R. 4699 reported favorably by the Committee on Indian Affairs. The bill under consideration referred these claims to the Court of Claims for decision and the other bill provided for direct appropriation and recognition by the Congress of the obligation to pay the Cherokee Indians the sum of $27,500. It is now proposed to refer all four claims for adjudication, so far as the back interest is concerned, to the Court of Claims. Has the gentleman the amendment that he proposes to offer in case the bill is given the right of consideration?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; it is to the effect that the attorney for the Cherokee Nation shall be paid such fees as the Court of Claims shall find reasonable, the same to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and then not to exceed a certain amount.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Would the gentleman say that an attorney would be fairly entitled to exceed $5,000 for his work in this case?

Mr. HASTINGS. It is like this: There are four items in this claim. I think a fee of 15 per cent on three of those items in the event their contention was sustained would be very small for the services rendered. In the event the larger item is found due, then perhaps that would be considered a large fee, but this provides that it is to be approved first by the Court of Claims and by the Secretary of the Interior, and, also, that it shall not be above a certain amount.

Mr. NORTON. Would the gentleman have any objection to stipulating that it shall not be over $5,000, and in suggesting that I would say this: I believe the Indians will receive better service, and this will be adjudicated much more quickly, if a definite sum of that kind is set. I think that is a sufficient amount.

Mr. HASTINGS. I respectfully submit that it is not a sufficient amount. The attorney who has been working on this has been working on it ever since this judgment was granted 12 or 15 years ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk again reported the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HASTINGS: Strike out all after the word "case," in line 6, page 3, of the bill, and insert:

"The attorney for the Cherokee Nation shall be paid such fee as the Court of Claims may find reasonable, the same to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That in no case shall the fee decreed by said Court of Claims be in excess of the amount stipulated in his contract of employment nor amount to more than 10 per cent of the sum, if any, to which the Cherokee Nation shall be found entitled. The amount recovered, if any, for the Cherokee Nation shall be disbursed under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior to the parties entitled thereto in the manner prescribed by the Court of Claims."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HASTINGS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a communication about postal matters from the Postmaster General, which I think will be found of use and information to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The communication referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 16, 1918.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman House Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

MY DEAR MR. MOON: I am in receipt of your communication of December 14, 1918, inclosing copy of House joint resolution 368 and requesting my views with respect thereto.

In my judgment this joint resolution should be adopted.

The principle which justifies Government control of the Postal Service applies equally to all electrical means of communication. The Constitution, in giving Congress control over post offices and post roads, obviously contemplated, not particular physical structures, but the communication of intelligence.

To establish and maintain means of communication is as much the function of the Government as is the provision for national defense. An established and widely extended means of communication is, in fact, a part of the national defense. Moreover, it is essential to the development of the country and to the progress and prosperity of its people. It is a defense of the national interests as much in peace as in war.

The authority given by the Constitution for Government control of the transmission of communication carries with it the implied obligation on the part of the Government to provide the means of communication. The function of transmitting intelligence in the service of the general public must of necessity be a monopoly, so that it may be operated in a way to be accessible to the entire public.

The wire service is a public utility of universal necessity and is adapted to the performance of no other function than that of conveying intelligence; and, disregarding the divergence of views as to Government ownership of public utilities generally, it must be recognized that electrical agencies of communication stand alone as an essential utility performing a Government function. The progress and prosperity of the Nation are dependent upon expansive means of communication between and among the people. Extension of the wire service should be determined by public needs, not the opportunity for private gain. The wire systems are supported by the public because they are a necessity in social life and in all business enterprises, however wasteful they may be in their methods of operation or extravagant in the charges. Up to this time the charges for service have been greater and the service less extensive because of wasteful duplications and competition. The extent of the service under private ownership is restricted to areas where it may be operated profitably to the individual owners. The competition which it invites is that which is in pursuit of profit, not in rivalry for public benefit and service. An extended survey of the situation has been made by the Post Office Department since the Government assumed control of the wire systems, and it clearly appears that unification of control and operation are necessary to eliminate the wastes and inherent defects of the competing and duplicating system which has heretofore existed. It would be as logical to have two or more post offices in the same town operating independently and where the patrons of each had no means of communication with the other as to allow two telephone systems to operate in the same territory, for in either case the cost to the public is muliplied and the utility divided.

Mr. Theodore N. Vail, president of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and probably the highest authority on wire service in the world, in a communication of the 6th instant, in which he quotes extensively from his annual report for the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., says that the service should afford electrical communication "of every kind of intelligence from anyone at any place to anyone at any other place; that the service should be comprehensive, nation wide, economical, at a minimum price so that potential business could be developed.

"To do this effectively and economically requires the combination of every kind of electrical transmission of intelligence into one system over which the most efficient service could be rendered through the development of new and useful services, and the wire plant and facilities thus be utilized to their fullest extent * * *.

"To get the best result, therefore, the common control of this unified system should extend to the furthest possible limits. Should cover our Nation and the international communications to the boundaries of all other nations with which we have existing or potential relations.

"Whatever may be done in the practical reorganization and operation of electrical communication — domestic or international—in or by the United States, whether 'open wire,' 'cable or radio,' there should be such close harmony of effort and operation one with the other and all with the internal wire systems that, in effect, there should be 'one control' of all and the cooperation and coordination of all connected or related activities, including research, investigation, and experimentation. Only in this way can the greatest results in service, in public benefit, in economy, or in cheapness be obtained."

The Government alone can safely exercise a right of monopoly such as the wire service calls for, but some plan of organization should be devised which will combine all the advantages and the authority possessed by the Government without losing the benefits of the experience of the best operation which our industrial world has demonstrated to be advantageous. The advantages of private initiative in research, investigation, and experimentation, and in other ways where possible and consistent with Government monopoly should not be lost in the inauguration of such a new system. I believe an effective plan to accomplish that result can be worked out.

The information acquired through Federal control of the telegraph and telephone systems since August 1 last enables me to assure you that the entire wire system can be acquired without requiring the appropriation of a dollar from the Public Treasury, and that through the savings by the elimination of duplications in plants and operating expenses the entire telegraph and telephone systems of the country can be paid for through an amortization fund in 25 years without increasing the rates to the public and at the same time develop a national wire system available for the use of every community in the country coextensive with the present Postal Service.

The economic importance of the proposition to acquire the properties by the Government is very great. Private capital is invested in public-service enterprises with the expectation of 7 to 8 per cent and often a greater return upon the investment. This, of course, the public is expected to pay, while the Government can borrow money at 4½ per cent. The public, however, pays the charge in either event. The difference between 4½ per cent and 8 per cent for the money invested in the wire systems of the United States would maintain and pay for the property in 18 years and 9 months. The Government as owner would no more expect to charge for interest on the investment than it would for money invested in postal facilities, navy yards, or other public property, and, as Mr. Vail has so well said:

"In any utility the permanent plant and equipment are by far the largest items of capital investment; the maintenance of plant and the proper provision for depreciation and obsolescence and taxes are second only to the cost of wages.

"If the uses of combined plant can be multiplied, extended, and utilized, it not only means reduction in the investment relative to increased utilization; it means one charge for taxes, maintenance, depreciation, and obsolescence, all of which will be reflected in the cost of operation, for, broadly speaking, upon the cost of operation charges for service are based."

Government ownership of the telegraph and telephone can in no sense be considered a party question. As early as 1844, when the Morse telegraph was in its infancy, Congress made an appropriation looking to its acquisition by the Postal Service.

In 1845 and again in 1846 the Postmaster Generl recommended that it be made a part of the postal monopoly. By the act of July 24, 1866, and the acceptance by the telegraph companies of the provisions thereof, the United States obtained an option to purchase the telegraph properties at their appraised value at any time. This option is still in full force and effect.

Postmaster General Randall in his annual report for 1867 called attention to the fact that the telegraph system of Great Britain had been put in charge of the British Post Office Department and, after stating that it was a matter of very great importance, which ought to be thoroughly investigated by Congress, recommended the appointment of a special commission to inquire into the workings of the new arrangement in Great Britain and into its feasibility in the United States.

Postmaster General Cresswell, who succeeded Mr. Randall, in his reports of 1869 and 1871 devoted considerable attention to the matter, and in the latter report, after discussing the progress of the regulation and control or the ownership and management of telegraph systems in foreign countries, said:

"These facts, all tending with overwhelming force in one direction, demonstrate conclusively the utility of the postal telegraph for both Government and the people. * * * I therefore deprecate further delay [in acquiring the telegraph lines] as injurious to the public interests."

In transmitting Postmaster General Cresswell's report to Congress, President Grant wrote:

"The suggestions of the Postmaster General for improvement in the department presided over by him are earnestly recommended to your special attention; especially do I recommend favorble consideration of the plan for uniting the telegraph system of the United States with the postal system. It is believed that by such a course the cost of telegraphing could be much reduced and the service as well, if not better, rendered. It would secure the further advantage of extending the telegraph through the portions of the country where private enterprise will not construct it. Commerce, trade, and, above all, the efforts to bring the people widely separated into a community of interest are always benefited by a rapid intercommunication."

Again, in 1873, Postmaster General Cresswell earnestly renewed his recommendation for the acquisition of the telegraph by the Government.

The matter of Government control of the telegraph systems of the country does not appear to have been again discussed in reports of the department until the report of Postmaster General Maynard for the year 1880. He refers to a visit to the British post office and to the success of the operation of the telegraph system by the postal service of that country, and inquires:

"Is it not time for us to renew the inquiry whether it is wise to leave this important instrument of correspondence in charge of corporations whose primary object is gain to the managers and stockholders and the convenience of the public secondary only?"

Postmaster General Howe in his report for 1882 refers to the consideration which was given in the past to the question by the Postmaster General and committees of Congress, who have urged that the Post Office Department should take exclusive possession of the telegraph service, and states that he is forced to the conclusion "that the time has fully come" when the telegraph and postal services should be embraced under one management.

Postmaster General Gresham in his report for 1883 presents the legal phase of the subject, and concludes that Congress has constitutional power to assume control of the telegraph either by acquisition and operation of existing lines or the construction of lines which would operate in competition with existing companies.

Postmaster General Wanamaker in his annual reports for 1889, 1890, 1891, and 1892 strongly urged the operation of the telegraph lines as a part of the postal system by contract or otherwise, and forcibly presented his views as to the benefits and economies to the public by such unification and operation of the two systems, and in his reports for 1891 and 1892 he also recommended the utilization of the telephone systems as a part of the Postal Service.

Postmaster General Payne in his report of 1903 recommended an appropriation by Congress for the purpose of enabling the Postmaster General to investigate the propriety of extending the privileges of special delivery of letters or the contents thereof by means of the telephone.

Postmaster General Cortelyou, in his report of 1906 referred to departmental investigations to be had to determine the feasibility of the adoption of many important policies of administration, including the postal telegraph and telephone.

Postmaster General Hitchcock in his annual report of 1911 strongly urged that the telegraph lines be made part of the Postal Service and operated in conjunction with the mail service, as is done in practically all of the European countries, including Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia, Austria, and Germany.

The present Postmaster General in his annual report for 1913 and subsequent reports has urged the Government ownership of both the telegraph and the telephone systems and their operation in connection with the Postal Service.

More than 70 bills have been introduced in Congress since 1871 to secure legislation for the purchase or control by the Government of the telegraph lines, and more than a score of these bills have been reported favorably by Senate or House committees.

The purchase, lease, or other forms of control of the telegraph and telephone have been advocated by many Senators and Representatives, and public men such as Henry Clay, Charles Sumner, Hannibal Hamlin, President Grant, Senators Edmunds, Dawes, Chandler, nearly all of the Postmasters General since the Civil War, as well as by leading publicists and economists of the country, regardless of party or factional alignments, and there is absolutely no reason why the question should be made a political one at this time.

The telegraph and telephone systems are now being operated by the Postmaster General for the duration of the war. Awards have been made for compensation, or compensation agreed upon, with the leading telegraph and telephone companies, and the properties are now being operated as one system. An opportunity is thus presented to demonstrate the advantages or disadvantages to the public of the joint operation of the telegraph and telephone systems and the Postal Service, which has been so strongly urged upon Congress in one form or another for over 75 years.

The present control will, under existing law, cease upon the proclamation of the President of the ratification of the terms of peace. Many of the independent telephone companies could not take back the properties without serious loss to the investors and great detriment to the service. I find that many of these companies were operating at a loss, due to the waste incident to competition and delivery of State regulation, and that, owing to the failure to set aside proper depreciation funds, many of the properties were rapidly drifting into a condition where they could not give proper public service and had been operating under such conditions that new capital could not be provided for renewals; in fact, some of the larger companies are losing hundreds of thousands of dollars a year in some States in operating the properties under the abnormal conditions which have existed during the present war. The interest of the public, the investors, and the maintenance of the properties all require that the telegraph and telephone properties should not be returned to the owners in the present situation of affairs.

One of the objections advanced against Government ownership of the telegraph and telephone systems is that the party in power would be able to make use of the private information contained in telegraph and telephone messages, passing over the lines, for political purposes. In this connection your attention is called to the fact that the act of Congress approved October 29 last provides heavy penalties for divulging the contents of any telegraph or telephone message. In fact, this law throws around telegraph and telephone messages all of the safeguards as to privacy that previously existed with respect to sealed communications passing through the mails.

Some such legislations as the pending joint resolution would seem to be imperative in view of the facts stated.

Very truly, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

PERSONNEL OF COAST GUARD.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6979) to regulate the personnel of the Coast Guard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman who reported the bill, who is unavoidably absent from the city to-day, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. FOSTER. That is to go to the foot of the calendar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To go to the foot of the calendar?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

There was no objection.

MINING ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 385) to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may remain on the calendar.

Mr. FOSTER. At the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the bill remain on the calendar, to go to the foot thereof. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TO PERMIT THE GOVERNMENT TO USED SEIZED OPIUM, ETC.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9830) providing for the disposition of opium, its salts and derivatives, coca leaves, their salts and derivatives, and any other drugs seized by the United States Government in the enforcement of the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, as amended by the acts of March 3, 1897, February 9, 1909, and January 17, 1914, or the act of December 17, 1914.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand this has been incorporated in the war-revenue act in the Senate——

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know; not this.

Mr. STAFFORD. When this bill was last brought up on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, if my memory serves me right, the gentleman from Illinois, who introduced the bill and made the report, requested that the bill be passed over without prejudice, and I ask unanimous consent, in his absence, that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. FOSTER. I have sent for the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. The chairman of the committee will be here in just a moment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over temporarily to be taken up when the gentleman from North Carolina comes in the Chamber.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a pretty important bill.

Mr. WALSH. Why should not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] also be present, who introduced the bill and made the report?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over temporarily. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. This is to be just temporary?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the announcement the Chair made. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. What is the gentleman's request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That the bill be passed over temporarily. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXEMPTING WRECKING VESSELS FROM THE PROVISIONS OF THE SEAMEN'S ACT.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11408) to amend section 4516 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by sections 1 and 2 of an act entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion, and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea," approved March 4, 1915.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Let us have the bill reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4516 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by sections 1 and 2 of an "Act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea," approved March 4, 1915, be amended by striking out the period at the end of said sections 1 and 2 and adding the following words: "or wrecking vessels."

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "sections" and insert the word "section."

Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "and two," and after the word "of" strike out the word "an" and insert the words "the act entitled 'an.'"

Page 2, line 5, after the word "fifteen," strike out the word "be" and insert "and section 2 of said act of March 4, 1915, are hereby."

Page 2, line 6, after the word "by," strike out the words "striking out" and insert the words "inserting before."

Page 2, line 7, after the word "of," insert the words "each of."

Page 8, after the word "sections," strike out the words "1 and 2 and adding," and amend the title.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire of some member of the committee what are the provisions of sections 1 and 2 from which this bill seeks to relieve wrecking vessels?

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] will explain, if necessary, more at length, but I will simply say this: In the original enactment of the seamen's bill there was a requirement for certain watch officers on board the different vessels and there were exceptions to it. For instance, in the provision yachts were excepted and fishing vessels, but it was overlooked that there was not any need for different watches on board a wrecking vessel, which is stationary in the main, and when this was called to the attention of the committee, that we had required different watches on wrecking vessels, they immediately and unanimously added an exemption which also extended to wrecking vessels.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand from the gentleman's statement that sections 1 and 2 merely relate to watches on board vessels?

Mr. HARDY. This provision, as I remember it, adds wrecking vessels to the exemption in reference to watches. There is no objection to it by anybody.

Mr. STAFFORD. These wrecking vessels see service on the high seas, and it is very necessary they should come under the scope of certain provisions of the seamen's law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The seamen's act provides for the crewing of vessels and is quite rigid in its requirements. Now, in view of the fact that wrecking vessels are only navigated when going from one wreck to another, and for a greater part of the time are stationary while they are engaged in the wrecking business, it will be a very great hardship for them to be manned under the standards of the seamen's act. The law gives to the steamboat inspectors the power to determine what a sufficient manning of wrecking vessels may be for their safe navigation, just like on yachts and fishing vessels, and it gives them great discretion.

Mr. STAFFORD. The vessels will be relieved from the absolute requirement as to the number of watches and number of seamen, but leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce to determine what should be the proper complement of men?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; that is it. As it is, it is a very great hardship.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows: "A bill to amend section 4516 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and section 2 of an act entitled 'An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion, and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea,' approved March 4, 1915."

On motion of Mr. FORDNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that roll call No. 13, which was the roll call last had, be vacated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the last roll call, No. 13, be vacated.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] was interested in that. He has stepped from the Chamber a moment. I shall object until his return and see whether he wishes it done or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill (H. R. 13366) relative to uniforms and equipment of soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

GOVERNMENT USE OF SEIZED OPIUM.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill H. R. 9830, which was passed over temporarily a moment ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9830) providing for the disposition of opium, its salts and derivatives, coca leaves, their salts and derivatives, and any other drugs seized by the United States Government in the enforcement of the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, as amended by the acts of March 3, 1897, February 9, 1909, and January 17, 1914, or the act of December 17, 1914.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let the Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all opium, its salts, derivatives, and compounds, and coca leaves, salts, derivatives, and compounds thereof, which may now be under seizure or which may hereafter be seized by the United States Government from any person or persons charged with any violation of the act of October 1, 1890, as amended by the acts of March 3, 1897, February 9, 1909, and January 17, 1914, or the act of December 17, 1914, shall, upon conviction of the person or persons from whom seized, be confiscated by and forfeited to the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to deliver for medical or scientific purposes to any department, bureau, or other agency of the United States Government, upon proper application therefor under such regulation as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, any of the drugs so seized, confiscated, and forfeited to the United States.

The provisions of this act shall also apply to any of the aforesaid drugs seized or coming into the possession of the United States in the enforcement of any of the above-mentioned acts where the owner or owners thereof are unknown. None of the aforesaid drugs coming into possession of the United States under the operation of said acts, or the provisions of this act, shall be destroyed without certification by a committee appointed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, that they are of no value for medical or scientific purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the gentleman from North Carolina that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. MANN. How much of this stuff is now on hand?

Mr. KITCHIN. About $100,000 worth on the date this bill was reported out.

Mr. MANN. How rapidly does it accumulate and how long a time does that represent? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. KITCHIN. I really do not know. I think most of it must have been seized since the act passed in 1914.

Mr. MANN. Well, I supposed there was a considerable amount seized on importations at different times. What has been done with that under the law?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is in the hands of the agents of the Government. The smoking opium, that which is seized mostly from importation, under the law, they can sell to the highest bidder, and that was disposed of and the money, of course, turned into the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman sure that smoking opium is sold? I think it is not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Smoking opium was authorized to be sold to the highest bidder; but other opium, coca leaves, their salts and derivatives, could not be sold, and, of course, had to be held by the Government, either by the customhouse officials or, if the offenders were convicted, by the Department of Justice.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman states that smoking opium seized is sold. That was not my impression. I may be wrong about it. I had a good deal to do with the passage of the original act to prohibit the importation of smoking opium. I must say I can not see we are so much better off if a man can import smoking opium, then have it seized by the Government, and then buy it on a sale by the Government. We get the smoking opium and the evils of smoking opium. That was what we were seeking to abolish—the smoking.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, we are seeking to turn it all over and not sell it to the highest bidder. Turn it over to the department for medical and scientific purposes, under such rules and regulations as the International Revenue Commissioner may decide.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is, athough it is somewhat hazy, perhaps, that the scientists connected with the Government when we passed the original law practically stated that smoking opium was of no value for any scientific purpose.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, it may not be; but it would be turned over for some purpose and not get into the hands of the public for smoking.

Mr. MANN. Clearly it ought not to be sold.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Is there any particular urgency for the passage of this measure in order that some of these drugs may be destroyed or turned over to the Government?

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not catch the first part of the question.

Mr. WALSH. Is there any particular urgency for passing this in order to take over these drugs that have been accumulating?

Mr. KITCHIN. No particular urgency, except some of the bureaus desire it for scientific purposes.

Mr. WALSH. As the gentleman probably knows, we passed a bill here several months ago very similar to this, almost similar, except it was to take care of intoxicating liquors that have been accumulating, and the Government is having great difficulty in finding storage place for it, and it is filling up warehouses and having to hire buildings, and it was represented that was a particular urgency. The bill passed the House and is still slumbering. I wondered if the same method was to be pursued.

Mr. KITCHIN. I assure the gentleman that we will not have to build houses to take care of the seized opium. The Secretary of the Treasury recommends this. But there is no reason why we should not pass it, because every Member recognizes the fact that this seized and confiscated opium and coca leaves, and their salts and derivatives, ought to be disposed of by the Government in the way pointed out by this bill; that is, turn it over to the Government hospitals or to some bureau for scientific purposes. I understand the hospitals are in need of a great deal of this stuff that has been seized.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to know whether the prosecutions for violation of these acts are under the jurisdiction of the Attorney General or are they under the Treasury Department? Who prosecutes them? The Department of Justice?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Department of Justice prosecutes. The Treasury hunts up the cases, gets up the evidence, and makes the seizures.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me if the Department of Justice prosecutes the violation of this act they would be the ones that would deliver the property to these institutions, and that regulations in connection with its transfer should be made by the Department of Justice and the Attorney General rather than by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I wondered whether there was any particular reason for taking it out of the Attorney General's hands after the convictions had been secured. This provides that after it is seized it shall be turned over to the department under the rules and regulations of the Internal-Revenue Commissioner. I suppose after it is seized there will have to be some convictions had?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Now, after conviction is secured you put the matter out of the Attorney General's hands and turn it back to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Attorney General would turn it over to the Internal-Revenue Commissioner's office or dispose of it according to the rules and regulations that are prescribed.

Mr. WALSH. I suppose there will not be any conflict, but it seems to me that where a law officer of the Government takes charge of the prosecution of these cases, the violation of the internal-revenue laws or the use of these drugs, he ought to be the proper official to dispose of it. It would be in his custody during the trial of the case and under his control.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I will say to the gentleman that this opium and these derivatives are in the possession now of the Internal Revenue Department. The Attorney General's Department never gets it at all. This is taken away from the bootleggers in the red-light sections of cities and from illicit dealers everywhere. They have an immense amount of it; $100,000 worth, or even more than that much, has been taken since this bill was introduced. The amount is constantly increasing. The business of the Department of Justice is to convict these bootleggers when it can. After they are convicted there is not any provision of law under which these opiates can be disposed of at all. They are left in the hands of the Treasury Department.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. In cases where these opiates or derivative salts are taken and no conviction is secured, although the opium and salts are retained by the Government, what disposition is made of them?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. They ought not to be returned unless it can be shown they are in possession of them legitimately.

Mr. NORTON. I have in mind the fact that opium can be taken oftentimes by the Government and no claimant appears for it.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The Government ought to be authorized to dispose of it. There is a demand for every bit of it in our Red Cross hospitals at this moment. They are anxious to get it.

Mr. WALSH. I know that the gentleman from Illinois is very familiar with the provisions of the bill, because he introduced it and filed the report on it. He will notice that it is only upon conviction of the persons from whom it is received that this property is confiscated, and, of course, in order to secure conviction it is necessary for the law officers of the Government to prosecute the cases.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And in their prosecution of the cases they must have control and possession of the drugs upon which the prosecution is based.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. They do not bring it into court.

Mr. WALSH. They can not convict them without bringing it into court.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. If they take a chest of these drugs they do not have to bring the entire material into court. They can make proof and secure conviction. Under the laws as they now have them, they have extreme difficulty in convicting anybody.

Mr. WALSH. But it seems they should do in this as it is proposed to be done in the case of intoxicating liquors seized in violation of the Kenyon law and the Reed law.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. So that the Attorney General or the district attorney should turn over this property which is the basis of the prosecution and not turn it back to the internal revenue collector or to the Secretary of the Treasury, because it was not seized for failure to pay customs duties or anything of that sort.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the entire administration of the narcotic laws is in a terrific state of confusion. The laws are insufficient and have been held insufficient by the courts in very material parts. This bill is needed as a sort of makeshift to quickly reach the opium now on hand, in order that it may be disposed of and get it into the hands of the hospitals, where it will do some good. I did not draw this bill. I do not have any particular pride of authorship in it.

Mr. WALSH. It looks as if it were drawn in the department.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. It was drawn in the department, and it meets the approval of the internal-revenue officers, as well as the legal department. We are trying to amend the entire body of laws relating to the subject.

Mr. WALSH. I do not raise any objection to the passage of the bill, but in order to have a uniform practice I think it would be better to have a uniform procedure.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The entire subject ought to be rewritten. All of these laws ought to be rewritten, and they will be.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KITCHIN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

OLD CUSTOMHOUSE AT KENNEBUNK PORT, ME.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4283) authorizing the donation of land and building at Kennebunk Port, Me., known as the old customhouse, to the town of Kennebunk Port, Me.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask, in the absence of my colleague from Maine [Mr. GOODALL], who introduced the bill, which was referred to the Committee on Buildings and Grounds, that the bill be passed over by unanimous consent without prejudice.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. GOODALL], who introduced this bill, has been very energetic not only in securing the consideration of the bill in the committee but in the House, and he called upon me last night in connection with the merits of the bill. If his colleague makes this request I have no objection.

Mr. HERSEY. My colleague from Maine has been unable to be present to-day, and he asks that the bill be put at the foot of the calendar without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF RHODE ISLAND.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 3563) to increase the salary of the United States district attorney for the district of Rhode Island.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

GRANTING CERTAIN LANDS TO THE CITY OF SAN DIEGO.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3646) and put it upon its final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3646).

Mr. MANN. Let us have the bill reported.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. CRAMTON. The point of order is against taking up the bill, as it is a bill that is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I have other points, but that is the particular one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman.

Mr. CRAMTON. Rule XXIV, paragraph 2, provides for the disposition of business on the Speaker's table. That will be found on page 394 of the House Manual, section 860.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman think that section applies to the suspension of the rules?

Mr. CRAMTON. Possibly not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it does.

Mr. CRAMTON. May we have the motion again reported?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules, take up the bill, and consider it.

Mr. CRAMTON. And the motion does not state that a similar House bill has been reported?

The SPEAKER. No; it does not state it, and it does not have to. Is that all the point that the gentleman has? The point is overruled. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. That point is well taken, in all probability. [Laughter.] There is no quorum present.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. KETTNER and Mr. FOSTER) there were—22 ayes and 24 noes.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

The question of ordering tellers was taken and 25 Members arose, not a sufficient number.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—25 ayes and 33 noes.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—years 65, nays 181, answered present 1, not voting 185, as follows:

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER], who makes the motion to suspend the rules, because of some misunderstanding, feels that the bill would better go over to some other day. I move, therefore, that the House do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the acting chairman of the United States Shipping Board, transmitting, in response to a resolution of November 21, 1918, information relative to existing contracts for ship construction, the cost of such construction, in both private and Government shipyards, etc., which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EMERGENCY FLEET CORPORATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the vice president of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, transmitting a report containing an account of the operations of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, under the act approved March 1, 1918, empowering that corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire lands, houses, and buildings for housing purposes in connection with shipyards, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

THE COAL SITUATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant director of the fuel administration for the District of Columbia, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 14th instant, certain information relative to the price paid for storing coal in bins in the District of Columbia, which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that Mr. LA FOLLETTE, of Washington, had been appointed a conferee on the part of the House on the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, in the place of Mr. SINNOTT.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 357. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, consider, and determine certain claims of the Cherokee Nation against the United States;

H. R. 9830. An act providing for the disposition of opium, its salts and derivatives, coca leaves, their salts and derivatives, and any other drugs seized by the United States Government in the enforcement of the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, as amended by the acts of March 3, 1897, February 9, 1909, and January 17, 1914, or the act of December 17, 1914;

H. R. 11408. An act to amend section 4516 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and section 2 of an act entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea," approved March 4, 1915; and

H. R. 13366. An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of the faculty and public school of Milan; of the Central Michigan Normal School, of Mount Pleasant; of the Board of Education of Rogers; and of the Teachers' Club, of Grand Haven, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the creation of a department of education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

ANNIE T. BRAHAM.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 385, submitted by Mr. CALDER on the 13th instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Annie T. Braham, sole surviving relative of William E. Burke, late a messenger in the employ of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an order, and move its adoption. I will say in explanation that it covers the same committee places formerly occupied by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], and it assigns him to membership on the same committees.

The order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] be assigned to membership on the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce, the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, the Committee on Manufactures, the Committee on Pacific Railroads, the Committee on the Philippines, the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, and the Committee on Public Lands.

WATERWAYS AT SEATTLE, WASH.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have a supplemental report of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors with reference to the east and west waterways and the Duwamish waterway at Seattle, Wash. This report was transmitted from the office of the Chief of Engineers, War Department, pursuant to a resolution of the Committee on Commerce. The proposition is being considered in connection with the river and harbor bill, but until it is printed it is not in proper shape for consideration. The report is not lengthy, and I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 357. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, consider, and determine certain claims of the Cherokee Nation against the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

H. R. 9830. An act providing for the disposition of opium, its salts and derivatives, coca leaves, their salts and derivatives, and any other drugs seized by the United States Government in the enforcement of the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, as amended by the acts of March 3, 1897, February 9, 1909, and January 17, 1914, or the act of December 17, 1914, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

H. R. 11408. An act to amend section 4516 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and section 2 of an act entitled "An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea," approved March 4, 1915, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 13366. An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

The SECRETARY. Continuing the reading on page 10, beginning with line 19, Part II, Individuals, Normal tax. From this point in the bill all amendments were passed over down to and including line 13, on page 49.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This portion of the bill was passed over at the request of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The SECRETARY. The first amendment in the portion passed over will be found in line 1, page 11, where the committee proposes, after the word "tax," to strike out the comma and the words "as follows" and to insert "at the following rates."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I simply wish to state that it will be necessary for me to return to this provision of the bill, either to offer the substitute which I have prepared and upon which tables and computations are being made now and which are not completed, or to move for a reconsideration, as I may be advised is best under all considerations when the tables and computations are completed. But they are not ready at this time, and therefore I will not offer the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The next amendment will be stated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before the Secretary proceeds to read further, as we have a very full Senate, I wish to make a suggestion. In order to expedite the passage of the bill before the holidays it will be necessary for us to economize time in every possible way. We are losing a great deal of time unnecessarily in calling for a quorum. When we are about to take a yea-and-nay vote it is necessary to call a quorum, or else we might not have a quorum upon the yea-and-nay vote. Therefore a quorum is called as a matter of precaution.

If Senators can not be in the Chamber during this week when we are trying to make all possible speed to bring the bill to a final vote but will try to be near the Chamber to be reached by the notice given by the ringing of the bell when a yea-and-nay vote is taken, it will save us a great deal of time that we lose now in calling for a quorum preliminarily to taking a vote.

I wanted to make that suggestion, and if Senators will act upon it I think we will save a great deal of time.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, in section 210, on page 11, beginning with line 3, where the committee proposes to strike out all of subsections (a) and (b), in the following words:

(a) In the case of a citizen or resident of the United States 12 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 216: Provided, That upon the first $4,000 of this amount the rate shall be 6 per cent;

(b) In the case of a nonresident alien, 12 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 216.

And to insert in lieu the following:

(a) For the calendar year 1918, 12 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 216: Provided, That in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States the rate upon the first $4,000 of such amount shall be 6 per cent;

(b) For each calendar year thereafter, 8 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 216: Provided, That in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States the rate upon the first $4,000 of such amount shall be 4 per cent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In line 14 and in line 19, before the word "amount," I move to insert the word "excess."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, to this part of the bill the minority have signed a report, with one exception, reciting their objections. That report has been filed but has never been read to the Senate. It is short, and I should like the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the report.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall not object, if the Senator from Pennsylvania insists upon the reading of the report, but instead of raising the question now, why not let subdivision (b) of that section go over?

Mr. PENROSE. I am perfectly willing as to that, but I thought we might vote on it now.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the Senator from Pennsylvania going to address the Senate now?

Mr. PENROSE. I am going to first have the report read.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania desired to address the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. PENROSE (for himself, Mr. LODGE, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. DILLINGHAM), from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following views of a minority, to accompany H. R. 12863:

The undersigned minority members of the Committee on Finance feel constrained to withhold their support from the provisions recommended by the majority, having for their purpose the arbitrary fixing of rates for taxes to be collected mainly in 1920 to the estimated extent of $4,250,000,000.

With respect to those provisions of the bill as amended by the committee, which, it is estimated, will produce $6,000,000,000 revenue for a full 12-months period, we are generally in accord. These provisions are the result of months of painstaking deliberation and are based upon as accurate and reliable expert information as it was possible to obtain through every agency, official and other. They reflect actual business, industrial, and economic conditions now believed to exist, taking into consideration the rapid transition during the year from the maximum war-needs production to the sudden cessation of hostilities and the arrest of war industry.

Difficult as was the committee's task, its conclusions as to just and proper bases of taxation upon current-year conditions were, at least, approximately definite and consonant with known facts. We, therefore, were enabled by patient consideration to apply the new and increased taxes in a way to harmonize, so far as practicable, with existing economic, financial, and industrial conditions, and at the same time to provide all the revenue that revised estimates of the Treasury Department indicated as necessary in view of the signing of the armistice, namely, $6,000,000,000, or $2,000,000,000 less than was estimated the bill carried when it came to the Senate. The fact that rapidly changing conditions, while the bill was under consideration in the Committee on Finance, enabled the committee to reduce the amount of taxes $2,000,000,000 furnishes a forcible illustration of the importance of legislating on the subject of taxation, so vital to the country, with the utmost care and in the light of ascertained conditions. It further demonstrates how unwise is the policy of haste and the anticipation of future needs at a time when radical changes in domestic and world conditions render to-day's conclusions perhaps worthless to-morrow.

We recall that it was insisted in July and August, last, that the revenue bill, not even then prepared, should become a law not later than September 28. Disaster to the fourth liberty loan was predicted and apprehension was expressed as to the inability of the Secretary of the Treasury to market short-time certificates if the bill were not on the statute books by that date. These predictions, fortunately, were unfulfilled. The Secretary experienced no difficulty in placing short-time certificates and the fourth liberty loan was oversubscribed. The country was not affected by lack of knowledge in advance as to the extent and methods of taxation, but went ahead and met each situation as it arose.

Who now will claim that Congress was not justified or lacked wisdom in deliberating upon this, the greatest of all tax bills in history? The fact alone that changed conditions made possible a reduction of $2,000,000,000 in the interest of the taxpayers justifies the care and scrutiny given the bill by those charged with the constitutional duty of framing it.

In the light, therefore, of this recent valuable experience and object lesson it would be entirely without justification to attempt to prescribe for the American people what amount of taxes they shall be called upon to pay in the year 1920. We can not fail to be impressed with the many difficulties encountered, even with every possible aid, in levying just taxes for the current year; and to undertake to project ourselves into the future, so filled with portentous changes, and arbitrarily and rigidly to fix taxes for the year 1920 is in violation of every sound principle of legislative procedure, and economically is fallacious and unsound.

No one can foresee the full course of events which will crowd the intervening months, and no one with any degree of definiteness can estimate the Government's needs or the country's industrial prosperity. Sources of revenue not now tapped may be made to yield a just portion, thus relieving other sources from onerous taxation. Who can foresee clearly results from the readjustment and reconstruction program inevitably impending and bound to follow the return of peace? Both capital and labor are vitally interested in these readjustments and will be affected by them in a way that can not be foretold. The problem of the high cost of living is not the least of those awaiting attention, and a wise and carefully considered economic policy must be framed at the proper time with full information as to the facts. Care must be exercised not to disarrange our industrial system in a way which will render either capital or labor less employed in profitable pursuits than at the present time. A sound policy demands that no legislation shall be enacted which will suddenly or unwisely disturb values and prices. Vast governmental undertakings and agencies, made necessary by the war, must come in for a large share of consideration as to the policy to be adopted with respect to those activities in the future, thus presenting the most difficult domestic problems ever confronted by this Nation.

No program for the near or even distant future has been evolved—nothing but the merest outlines, suggestions, and preliminaries—and yet, on the threshold of these nebulous conditions, it is proposed to lay down a hard and fast scheme of taxation for the future. The only argument advanced in behalf of this extraordinary proposition to fix arbitrarily the rates of taxation in the present bill for the year 1920 is that the taxpayers are entitled to know the amount of reduction in taxes and the character of the taxes for that year. It does not seem to the minority that this argument furnishes any justification for violating the methods of orderly legislative procedure. Every taxpayer in the country knows that taxes will be reduced after this year as the inevitable result of a reduction in governmental needs following the declaration of peace. Every business man knows the next Congress can enact a revenue measure, based on accurate information as to the then existing conditions, which will reduce the burdens of taxation so far as the requirements of the Government will permit. Why, then, attempt to do so in this bill with no knowledge of future conditions and needs?

As a 1918 measure the undersigned minority members of the committee concur in the reporting of the bill, but the measure should stand essentially as a 1918 measure, and the many changes which will be necessary to adapt the tax law to conditions found to obtain in 1919, and subsequent years, should follow and be made at one time and in the light of as full information as it will be possible to obtain.

BOIES PENROSE.
H. C. LODGE.
P. J. MCCUMBER.
REED SMOOT.
CHAS. E. TOWNSEND.
WM. P. DILLINGHAM.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I perhaps conveyed a wrong impression when I stated to the Senate that this minority report was signed by all the members of the minority, with one exception. I ought to say that the minority were unanimous in dissenting from the attempt to fix the 1920 taxes in this bill. The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] refrained from joining in the minority report because of the fact that he objected to the general plan of taxation contained in the bill, in which the other members of the minority, realizing the limitations under which the present Congress is acting, were willing in a general way to concur. I think it only fair to state this, because it shows a unanimity of protest. I desire to quote from the views filed by the senior Senator from Wisconsin, in which he says:

> I concur fully with the minority report of the Committee on Finance in withholding support from the provisions recommended by the majority, having for their purpose the arbitrary fixing of rates of taxation to be collected in 1920. In the confusion and chaos resulting from the sudden termination of the war, neither the needs of the Government nor the sources of its income for 1920 can be more than wildly approximated at this time, and, in my opinion, no sound reason for this proposed legislation has ever been given.

Then he goes on to say—and it explains why he did not sign the report—

> I dissent, however, from so much of the report of the minority members of the Finance Committee as concurs with the majority in proposing to raise by taxation under this bill only $6,000,000,000 or even less than that amount for the taxable year, and which in consequence permits war profits and excessive incomes to escape fair and reasonable taxation.

Then he proceeds in his report to outline his views on a scheme of taxation which would meet his approval.

Mr. President, as the Senate has now reached the point in the bill where there is a sharp divergence of opinion between the united minority and majority of the Finance Committee, I shall take advantage of the opportunity to present briefly some of my views upon the pending measure.

NO OPPOSITION TO ESSENTIAL WAR REVENUE LEGISLATION.

This bill comes up for enactment after peace has been won, a victorious peace, gained in no small part through the determination, resources, sacrifices, and valor of the people of the United States. The great financial task of our country is still, however, to meet the cost of the war, and it is as a war measure that this bill primarily is to be judged. It is because the bill is essentially a war measure that I am willing to support it, although dissenting from the special 1920 provisions, and only accepting many other provisions because I realize that the bill is, perhaps, the best that can be had under existing limitations. To raise by taxation, principally upon the incomes of the people and the industries of the country for the past year, about $6,000,000,000—nearly six times the prewar income of our country from all sources—is justified only by the staggering expenditures in the great cause, and can be sanctioned only by the patriotic spirit of our people.

The report of the majority of the Finance Committee, and the address of the Senator from North Carolina, the chairman of the committee, furnish a detailed explanation of the measure which I need not duplicate or amplify. I shall confine my remarks to a brief statement of some of the salient features, an understanding of which seems to me essential for the consideration of the bill, in its present form, by the Senate and by the country. I know the measure is far from perfect, and I also recognize the difficulties which have been encountered. Yielding to the consensus of opinion of the majority in the committee and having aided so far as I could to eliminate objectionable features, and to support a large number of amendments of great importance, which have been adopted, I trust the bill will pass at as early a date as may be consistent with full consideration and discussion. In stating this I believe I am also voicing the patriotic sentiment of the country, which recognizes the needs of the hour and is willing to make the sacrifice.

PRIMARILY A WAR MEASURE.

The pending bill primarily is a war measure. It is the largest tax bill in the history of modern countries. It reaches the highest mark of taxation, and it is hoped and expected that subsequent measures will amend errors and omissions in the present bill and will provide a steady reduction of taxes as the affairs of the country are readjusted, and retrenchment, curtailment, and economy diminish the requirements of the Government. While the war is over, it must not be imagined that expenditures can drop instantly to a peace footing. One great item of expense, the maintenance and pay of the armies in the field, must remain for some time, however rapidly the troops are brought back. We can not consider ourselves fairly upon a peace basis until peace shall have been declared and demobilization accomplished.

EXHAUSTIVE CONSIDERATION OF BILL IN COMMITTEES.

The bill has had exhaustive consideration in the committees of the House and Senate for a period extending over several months. Hearings have been had, and information has been received from official experts and from communications from taxpayers, fully reciting their views. I take this opportunity to commend the spirit of patriotism, free from any taint of partisanship, which prevailed in the Committee on Finance during the consideration of the bill. In the deliberations of this committee, which frequently, in the history of the country, has been the center of political strife waged over economic questions, only one purpose seemed to prevail, and that was to raise the taxes required for the needs of the Government by methods fair and equitable. I should also like to say that a similar spirit obtained among the taxpayers who appeared before the committee or saw the members thereof in personal interviews. I do not recall a single important case where exemption from taxation was requested for any section or industry. The single desire on the part of the taxpayers seemed to be that the taxes should be levied along lines fair, equitable, and sound from an economic point of view. Further than that no claim was raised.

TAX ADVISORY BOARD.

In the act of 1917 many glaring inconsistencies and omissions exist. A large number of these defects were cured by the rulings and constructions of the Tax Advisory Board created and supported by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and I take this opportunity to express my appreciation of the invaluable work accomplished in this connection by the board. Its rulings and constructions have been sane, wise, and courageous, and have resulted, in my opinion, in preventing many disastrous results which might have followed from the act of 1917 had the board not undertaken to interpret the act on broad and equitable lines. The remarkable feature about the board has been its lack of legal power to determine finally taxes or constructions. Its power has been entirely of a recommendatory character, and I do not know of any case of importance where its decisions have been overruled. The taxpayer has had the privilege of appealing directly to the board and, on the whole, I recall few bureaus of the Treasury Department which have administered such trying and arduous duties more effectively. The board has been retained in the present bill, and it is worthy of note that it has been the deliberate purpose to refrain from bestowing any actual power upon the board beyond that of recommendation, the thought being that it can perform its duties most effectively and retain the confidence of Government officials and taxpayers more firmly by continuing its powers as purely recommendatory.

CODIFICATION OF TAX LAWS.

I have referred to the many defects in the present law which have been partially remedied by rulings of the Treasury Department, and which have been more fully and definitely corrected in the pending bill by the excellent amendments made by the Committee on Finance. I think it well to call particular attention, in passing, to a very confusing defect in the present law which has been corrected in the pending bill. I refer to the very objectionable feature of the 1917 legislation in that the income tax was left spread through two statutes. This made it difficult for the taxpayer to find out what his rights and obligations were. In the present bill these taxes have been put in a single statute. It was most confusing to the taxpayer to be confronted with this independent extension of additional taxes running all through the law of 1917, including excess-profits taxes. The present measure is a complete codification of the tax laws, so far as concerns the internal-revenue system. In other words, the existing law is now codified and reenacted with the additional increased taxes and amendments, so that the old law is, for all practical purposes, to be disregarded except in so far as the few paragraphs relating to the Tariff Commission, a protective tariff on dyestuffs, and a few other paragraphs are concerned. It is needless to say, however, that the present law will still continue to affect cases pending.

IMPORTANT TREASURY DECISIONS EMBODIED IN AMENDMENTS.

I have referred to the very excellent work done by the Tax Advisory Board in construing the present law, and I am glad to be able to say that most of the important Treasury decisions construing the present law have been embodied in amendments, while many new provisions have been made to relieve the taxpayer from discrimination and inequality. In some instances these relief provisions have been especially designed to secure maximum of production in articles considered essential in the present emergency.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me right in that connection, I should like to say, so that it may be understood by the Senate, that while we have made no change in the House rates in the income tax and none in the excess-profits tax and surtax, except a slight reduction in the excess-profits tax for 1919 and some modifications in the surtax schedule but slightly affecting the revenue, yet we have, through the amendments the Senator is now speaking about, very materially reduced the income of the Government from those taxes. Whatever substantial deductions have been made in the income and profits taxes for 1919 have been made through the so-called ameliorative or relief measures to which the Senator is now referring, and which were adopted by the committee in order to remove the hardships growing out of a rigid enforcement of the definition of invested capital as it is found in the present law and the pending bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am glad the chairman of the committee has illuminated the subject by his interruption, because there is some misapprehension as to the character of these relief provisions. I take it that in some cases they have resulted in a reduction of revenue, and in some particular cases in a very large reduction; but such revenue has been made up elsewhere, and we were very fortunate in being confronted later on with a situation where we could reduce the revenue and still meet the requirements of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the reductions have been made in a spirit of fairness and justness to the taxpayer.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; and, Mr. President, the fact that it reduced the revenue never was an argument, to my mind, against adopting a provision to prevent injustice or inequality, or in favor of levying a tax on one man who, perchance, has an undercapitalized concern with his good will left out, on one side of the street, and another man, with his good will capitalized at an enormous figure, on the other side of the street, one paying heavy taxes and the other going scot free. Neither has it persuaded me, Mr. President, that revenue might be lost if the amendment were adopted by which the Government would not impose a tax on the taxpayer when at the end of the year he had incurred a loss instead of a profit. The Government can devise many ways of imposing taxes without taxing the bankrupt, or without framing a tax system so full of hardship and inequality that men wonder what kind of reasoning the Congress adopted to devise such a scheme.

In fact, Mr. President, on the point suggested, the general impression prevailed in the committee that these amendments were of very great and particular importance at the present time. The taxes heretofore have been so very much lower that inequality, while it might work injustice, could perhaps be borne by the taxpayer in a war measure, but when we were confronted by the provisions of a bill raising enormous revenues by taxes higher than were ever dreamed of in this country, and considerably higher, in most instances, than those prevailing in any other country, it became very evident that it was absolutely necessary to amend the bill wherever possible by carefully prepared amendments which would meet many complicated contingencies and avoid gross inequality, inequity, and, perhaps, disastrous financial results.

DIRECT AND INDIRECT TAXATION.

Direct taxation is comparatively new in the United States. Until within the last few years, whatever fiscal policy may have prevailed in the country, the bulk of the revenue was raised from the customhouse and certain recognized and established internal-revenue taxes, chiefly on liquor and tobacco. Later on, in 1909, the revenues were supplemented by excise taxes, followed by a small income tax in 1913. It was only in 1916 and 1917, however, that the Government of the United States undertook to raise by direct taxes—I mean taxes upon income, personal and corporate—any great portion of its revenue. Our experience with this system of taxation is therefore brief. Some assistance in solving the intricate problems which such a system involves is to be derived from England, where income taxes have been long established. No country, however, has experienced the repressive effect of rates as high as those in this bill. No European country has to meet in this field the same problems which arise in the United States. In England, for example, industries are mainly old and established. Here a large part of our essential production is carried on by new enterprises, constantly developed by the initiative of our people in the midst of the opportunities afforded in a new country. As a continuing levy anything like the present rates would operate strongly to discourage and repress that invaluable American initiative and enterprise. The repressive effect would, I am confident, cost the Government, even in revenue, far more than the additional yield of high rates. It would tend to force industries into stagnation.

Profiting, so far as we might, by the example of other countries, but, chiefly, being compelled to work out our own problems from our brief experience with direct taxes in the last few years, and after the most exhaustive study of industrial and financial conditions in this country, we have had to move slowly and steadily along firm ground where the topography was fully known. The perils of theoretical schemes of taxation had to be avoided. Attractive in theory, a little study of these propositions shows that we might be embarking upon uncharted waters. I am inclined to the conclusion that it is impossible to work out any single theory of taxation that will lead to success. I have more faith in the lessons of experience and practice than in the teachings of theory. For instance, it is urged that the schedule of miscellaneous taxes is arbitrary, and the fact is that the schedule must be acknowledged to be historical, accidental, and experimental. Taxes of this kind can not be worked out on any single, definite plan, but must proceed in the light of experience; and yet the miscellaneous taxes which we have had during the past year seem to have worked out satisfactorily and without undue hardship, and I believe that the new schedules, which have been made as moderate as possible, and in most cases below the rates imposed in the House bill, will, as temporary taxes, go equally well.

On the other hand, it has been urged that we should supersede by a single uniform and simple sales tax what has been described as a jumble of miscellaneous taxes, or, to pursue the theory to its logical conclusion, that we should adopt some kind of a turnover tax. I have yet to discover a workable plan for such a sales or turnover tax. For instance, one suggestion is that a tax of 1 per cent, levied on all sales made in this country, would be simple and yield nearly $3,000,000,000 of revenue, but I fail to find that such a tax would be simple as alleged. In the case of some articles, for instance, which pass through several trade channels before reaching the ultimate consumer, the tax would be applied four or five times, while in the case of other articles reaching the consumer more directly from the manufacturer the tax would be added, perhaps, only once or twice.

This inequality naturally would tend to create dissatisfaction on the part of the consumers. It would also operate as a great discrimination in favor of the very large industry, comprehending several different branches within itself, as compared with the small producer, who has to make use, perhaps, of other manufacturers, jobbers, and trade channels for articles which the big concern supplies for itself. To meet these difficulties it has been suggested that the tax should be 1 per cent on sales at retail, which tax would yield about $1,000,000,000. Confining the tax to retail sales would, it is claimed, work strange discrimination. Would the farmer be required to pay this tax on his plow if he bought it from the local hardware dealer? If so, he might be discriminated against as compared with the large agricultural operator of the West, who buys perhaps 20 plows in a lot from the wholesale dealer. If, on the other hand, sales of articles used only for production, even when made at retail, are not to be taxed, and the tax is to be confined to articles used only for consumption, the tax becomes most difficult of administration and, unless put at a high rate, can not produce very much revenue. This plan for a general sales tax may have much merit and be worthy of careful future consideration, but up to the present time I have not seen any scheme concretely worked out and capable of just application.

PROPORTION OF REVENUE WHICH SHOULD BE RAISED BY LOANS AND TAXES.

In the same way it is well to avoid being beguiled by theories as to the proportion of revenue which should be raised by loans and by taxes. I have already referred to the difference in conditions prevailing among the nations immediately menaced by the war as contrasted with our conditions here. In this instance also it seems to me that the exercise of common sense, and the arrival at conclusions after a careful study of the facts, will bring better practical results than the pursuit of theories. We must look at the requirements of the Government and the condition of industry. In England the proportion of expenditures of the Government raised by taxation during the war years through 1917, including amounts loaned to foreign governments, has been estimated, I am informed, at a little over 22 per cent, while in France the proportion was smaller, being some 14 per cent. In contrast with this relation between loans and taxes it is interesting to note the similar relation disclosed in the present bill. The Secretary of the Treasury's revised estimate of actual governmental expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, is approximately $18,000,000,000. It is estimated that this bill will, for a full 12 months' period, yield approximately $6,000,000,000, or 33⅓ per cent of the total of this vast expenditure.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I infer from what the Senator has already said, although he has not directly expressed himself to that effect, that in his opinion 33⅓ per cent is about as much as we ought to raise by taxation.

Mr. PENROSE. That is my opinion; and it is much larger, I was about to say, than that raised by any other country in the world.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator this question: Assuming that the expenses of the Government for 1920 will be about $7,000,000,000, in round numbers—the estimate of the department being between $6,000,000,000 and $7,000,000,000—the Senator would think that $4,000,000,000 of that amount would be ample to raise by taxation, would he not?

Mr. PENROSE. If the estimates for the following year are correct, I should be entirely satisfied with that proportion. My contention is, however, that we do not know whether those estimates are correct or what our expenses will be.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator: Suppose the expenditures, instead of being what the department estimates, should be as large as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] estimates—namely, $10,000,000,000—then would the Senator still think that $4,000,000,000 raised by taxation would be a sufficient amount?

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from North Carolina will wait a few moments I shall proceed to discuss what my idea is of the limit of direct taxes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator indicated 33⅓ per cent as his idea of the amount to be raised.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not think there is any magical figure. I was trying to show that we are levying by taxation, in relation to loans, considerably more than England and over twice as much as France. I was simply stating a fact. I hope to show as I proceed, if the Senator will permit me, what would be an answer to his question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I entirely agree with the Senator, that we are raising by taxation in this bill for the year 1920 a very much larger per cent than is raised by France or England.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator that the rule he lays down, however we may disagree on it, certainly would not apply to a time of peace.

Mr. PENROSE. I have not laid down any rule.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from North Carolina referred to 1920, a year after the war. When we are on a peace basis we will expect to raise all the money, and more, too, by taxation to run the Government.

Mr. PENROSE. I think so.

Mr. SIMMONS. That depends. It may be that we will be able to pay our war expenses during the fiscal year. Then our taxes will be comparatively very low next year, very much lower than the department has estimated and very much lower than the Senator from Utah has estimated. But if our expenditures for the year 1920 reach $10,000,000,000 or $7,000,000,000, it is clear that these amounts will greatly exceed the expenses of the Government in normal times. It is clear that in either event a large part of the expenditures will be war expenditures not paid during the war but paid after the war. The question is not when we pay them but whether when we do pay them we are paying war expenses as well as peace expenses. If we have to pay next year $10,000,000,000 nobody would say that exceeding $4,000,000,000 would be peace expenditures. The other $6,000,000,000 necessarily would be war expenses that we have not been able to pay this year and carried over to the next year. Therefore they should be dealt with just as war expenses are dealt with this year.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not think there is any substantial disagreement. I concede that the war is not over by any means, so far as expenses go.

Mr. SIMMONS. Or if it is over, if the Senator will pardon me, we will not be able to pay our war expenses this year, and they will be carried over to another year.

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly; and further than that, Mr. President, the very large item in our war expenses is the enormous cost of the pay and maintenance of 2,000,000 men in France. They can not be brought back immediately; neither can they be brought back without due regard for our responsibilities in Europe. I do not favor remaining too long in Europe and participating in their troubles there, but I am informed that the mere physical return of the troops will require six or seven months, or perhaps a year.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator certainly would not suggest that if our expenditures in the fiscal year 1920 are $10,000,000,000 because we have not been able to clear up our war indebtedness, we should raise that $10,000,000,000 by taxation?

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly not.

Mr. PENROSE. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that these war expenses must continue this year and for another year. Some Senators sitting near me, who are conversant with the situation, say that it will take three years to bring the troops back, and that they are better paid than any soldiers in the world. We have run the war on a more expensive basis than any nation in the world, and we, of course, have these war expenses. At the same time I entirely agree with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that when we once get on a peace footing and war expenditures are abolished, taxes should then pay all the revenues of the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PENROSE. As they always have in the history of the American Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. We ought then to cease bond issues. We ought to call upon the people to pay each year as we go after we get rid of these war expenditures. We can not afford to do it now, because if we should do it and the war expenditures carried over for future liquidation should be as great as indicated by some Senators, we would have to impose heavy war taxes upon the people of the country for years to come.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not think it has been amiss to have elucidated this point. I have received recently a large number of letters from people asking, "Why do we not proceed to a normal tax system?" They forget the war is not over and that demobilization has not as yet been achieved. This they ought to realize.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will interrupt the Senator just to say that I have had letters of that sort from people saying, "We are perfectly willing to pay these high taxes in time of war, but the war is over and these taxes ought to be taken off of us." That would be true provided that when the war is over we are rid of the war expenses—not expenditures that may accumulate in the future or after the war terminates, but expenses that may have accumulated or may accumulate during the war and that have not yet been met and can not be met during the fiscal year.

Mr. PENROSE. I think there are a very large number of people who have no conception of the expenditures of a war nature which the Government will have to provide long after peace shall have been declared, and I suggest this without advocating in any way a policy of prolonged and continued interference in European affairs. I simply stated that our relation of taxes to loans is one-third greater than that in England and over twice that in France to show that the American people are standing a heavier tax burden in relation to loans than any of the allied nations from whom we have any definite information.

Mr. President, reference has been made to the standard of relation between loans and taxes, and there we again want to avoid being beguiled by theories. I have already referred to the difference in conditions prevailing among the nations immediately menaced by the war as contrasted with our conditions here.

In this instance also it seems to me that the exercise of a little common sense and the arrival at conclusions after a careful study of the facts will bring better results than the pursuit of theories. We must look at the requirements of the Government and the condition of industry in England and in France, as to which I have already stated the proportions. It is evident, therefore, that the proportion of taxes to loans in the United States is over one-third greater as compared with England and over twice as large as compared with France.

I am willing to go as far as anyone in raising as much of the war expenses of the Government as possible from current revenue. I am willing to set aside the argument for the present that posterity can well afford to pay the larger part of these expenditures, which ultimately will result in such tremendous gains for our country and for civilization. Neither will I now lay stress on the fact that even the indebtedness already incurred is small as compared with the resources of the country, and certainly is not to be compared with the similar debts of the allies, not to mention the damages and losses they have suffered. Our debt even now is easily borne and managed and, in a nation which is destined in the near future to grow in power and wealth by leaps and bounds, it is reasonable to expect its liquidation at a not distant period. But apart from all these considerations, there is one insurmountable limit beyond which we can not go in the way of taxation. It would seem that the argument is unanswerable that we can not tax the individuals and industries of the country beyond the point which can be endured without stagnation or destruction. Suppose we take the extreme argument that the greater part of all incomes, personal and corporate, be appropriated by the Government to defray the expenses of the war and demobilization. But one result would inevitably follow—the absolute cessation of all extension and development of business, the complete suspension of all work involving initiative and enterprise, the utter failure of business to expand or develop, or even to maintain the necessary upkeep for the conduct of industry.

It would fail to secure revenue because industry would cease to produce income. Therefore, assuming that we are willing to levy taxes to the limit of endurance, we can go only to that limit—and we can not pass it—at which corporations can retain sufficient funds to permit them to operate and individuals can still have left enough incentive to prompt that splendid initiative and enterprise which are the chief sources of the greatness of America. I am firmly convinced that the present taxes approach that limit. I am of the opinion that if we go much further we will overreach ourselves in the very object of securing the revenue we have in mind. Perhaps these taxes can be borne in view of the fact that they are temporary in their nature. They inevitably must be lowered in the following year substantially, and it is to be hoped that in a comparatively short period a system of direct taxes can be devised, together with a scheme for the refunding and payment of our national debt, which will place our tax system upon a reasonable and enduring basis so that the country may be able to proceed, carrying its burden, it is true, but carrying it cheerfully and bravely, in the tremendous task of reconstruction and development. After all, even if the taxes are high for this year, even if sacrifices have to be made and, in numerous instances, money has to be borrowed to pay the taxes and profits have to be postponed, the American taxpayers will be inspired by the same patriotism manifested by them throughout the war in their generous response to each call for liberty loans. In their patriotism and sacrifice they have been second only to those who have given their full measure of devotion upon the field of battle.

PLAN OF TAXATION.

In discussing briefly the details of the bill I should like first to refer to the plan of taxation. This bill will, according to the estimates, raise from miscellaneous sources, principally beverages and tobacco, approximately $1,370,000,000, and from incomes approximately $4,600,000,000. The latter amount will be taken from corporate incomes estimated at $10,000,000,000, and from individual incomes subject to normal tax (account being taken of the exemptions allowed) of $4,700,000,000. When it is considered that a large part of the estimated income is not available for distribution or use as cash, but is, in a sense, paper income being tied up in inventories, plant equipment, and working capital, the weight of the tax burden imposed by this bill is apparent. The individual surtax rates attaining 65 per cent in addition to the normal tax of 12 per cent contrast with the highest figure adopted in England of slightly over 52 per cent, and with the figure of slightly over 12 per cent in France. The surtax rate of 65 per cent upon incomes of $1,000,000 or over contrasts with the surtax rate of 50 per cent upon incomes of $1,000,000 in Canada. A tax schedule which subjects any individual incomes to a total levy of 77 per cent is entirely without precedent in the history of taxation in any country. While England has had the war at her very doors, and was by way of the air actually invaded, this bill, as I understand it, exacts from the income of corporations at least as much as does the law of England, and on large individual incomes it levies the highest rates in the world.

RATES FOR FUTURE YEARS CAN NOT BE DETERMINED NOW.

The rates for future years can not be determined now. I had the report of the minority of the Finance Committee read before I began my remarks, and it is not necessary for me to go into this phase of the matter at any great length, but I should like to observe, in passing, that I do not see how it can be logically claimed that the rates for future years can be now determined. Strongly as I feel the necessity of reducing rates for the future, I do not believe that an attempt to provide for the future should be made in this bill, and the minority members practically all unite in this dissent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania pardon me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have in my hand, given to me by the clerk of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, the estimates of all the departments for the year 1920. The House Appropriations Committee has those estimates, and is now framing the bills based upon them. The proposed bills have been sent to the Committee on Appropriations of this body in advance of their action upon them. I suppose there must be some way in which the departments can determine beforehand with reasonable definiteness what would be the expenditures. Otherwise, they could not present these figures to the two bodies of Congress as the basis of appropriations for 1920.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have no doubt the departments have made estimates, and doubtless they have made outside estimates of far more money than they will be called upon to spend. I do not have very great confidence in the estimates of the departments at this time; in fact, during the last two years the frequently changing estimates handed in by the departments have shaken my confidence in them altogether in this connection. I am willing to make due allowance for the rapid changes which have occurred from day to day and from month to month during the war period; but I know the Secretary of the Treasury came to the Finance Committee, and has come during the last year and a half, with an estimate one week and that in another week four or five million dollars more were added, and then more, until I for one, I will say candidly, did not know "where I was at" or what I could expect.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania will recall that, while what he states is true, when the Secretary of the Treasury came before the Committee while we were framing the present law and stated that the estimates had been increased since they were originally made by the War Department and the Navy Department, still he did not ask for any more money by taxation; he did not ask that additional taxes be levied on that account upon the people.

The Senator will also recall that this year, while the committee was engaged in revising the pending bill, long before the armistice, the departments brought in some very considerable additional estimates after the appropriation bills had been passed; and, under the direction of the committee, I inquired of the Secretary of the Treasury if he would ask that more money be raised by taxation as the result of those additional estimates, and we were advised that he would not ask any additional sum by way of taxation.

I think it is not unlikely that, in addition to these estimates of appropriations of $7,443,000,000—and the estimates of the actual expenses are less—later the departments may come in and ask for more. They are not so likely to do that, however, as they were in the time of war, because then we were constantly increasing and enlarging our program, calling for more money. They may come, and probably will come; but, as I understand from the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury before the committee, even if the appropriations hereafter should exceed those asked for by the departments, $4,000,000,000 would still, in his judgment, be enough to raise by taxation during the year 1920.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, has the chairman of the committee the estimates on his desk?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I have the estimates of appropriation and I can give also the estimates of expenditures here, and I will put them in the RECORD if the Senator so desires.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have them put in the RECORD, and I should like to ask what the total is?

Mr. SIMMONS. The total estimate, including postal, regular, permanent, and indefinite appropriations, is $8,089,667,298.07. Deducting from that the postal revenues, $358,307,577, and the sinking fund requirement of the present law, which is $287,943,883, leaves a total of $7,443,415,838.07. I ask that the table of estimates be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Treasury estimates of actual expenditures for the fiscal year 1919–20 amount to, in round numbers, about $6,250,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I inquire at what time those estimates were submitted?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of appropriations? The clerk of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate handed them to me this morning and told me they were the estimates sent in.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not know how lately they have been prepared?

Mr. SIMMONS. No, I do not; but they are before the committee now, I take it.

Mr. WARREN. Of course the Senator realizes that they are only an approximation at the present time.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is so always.

Mr. WARREN. It is so now more than ever before. It is so now even more than if the war was still on.

Mr. SIMMONS. I disagree with the Senator about that. I think in times of war, when we were constantly changing our program and increasing expenditures from day to day, developing new plans and new schemes, we were likely to have a great many more additional estimates over those at first sent in than we are now when the war is over and we are drifting back toward normal conditions.

Mr. WARREN. Unfortunately, the war is not over yet; and, on the other hand, there are many thousands of contracts in connection with which an attempt is being made to secure legislation to effect a settlement. They amount not only to millions of dollars but to billions of dollars; and, of course, it is a matter of uncertainty at the present time to estimate what it is going to cost to secure a settlement where a contract is sought to be canceled by the Government and where the rights are with the other contracting party who must be bought off.

Mr. SIMMONS. My understanding is that the departments, in making their estimates for expenditures for the fiscal year 1919, in cutting down and determining what they can save, have taken care, so far as they could in their estimates, of the probable expenditures as a result of the cancellation of contracts; so that I do not think that will figure very largely in the matter.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have not the slightest doubt; in fact——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me further——

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. While, of course, there is some uncertainty about these estimates, I think there is less uncertainty about the estimates for 1920 than there is about the estimates for the present fiscal year. I am firmly convinced of that; and, while we are going to have, as the Senator says, to pay some damages for the cancellation of contracts and things of that sort, we are going to have also an immense salvage account this year that will result in bringing a large sum of money into the Treasury.

Then, Mr. President, we ought to consider, too, that we are going to have, as soon as the war closes, nearly $10,000,000,000 in the bonds of the allies, the best securities in the world, because, whatever might have been said about French bonds and about English bonds and Italian bonds in case the allies should have lost this fight, now that they have won there can be no question about the solvency of those securities and about their high class. Of course, those bonds are marketable, and we can utilize them for the purpose of relieving the people from excessive taxes in the future.

More than that, Mr. President, I want to say now, if the Senator from Pennsylvania will let me trench upon his time sufficiently to say it——

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say now that I do not believe that the people of this country are going to consent that the central powers shall escape without duly and properly reimbursing this country for the great losses that have been inflicted upon it by the methods which they have pursued in this war. I do not know whether the central powers will be able to pay the demands that are made upon them by the allies and by the United States; but whatever those demands are, based upon the capacity of that country to pay—and that ought to be the only limitation—the United States must have the same percentage of its losses allowed as the other allies, with the possible exception of France and Belgium. That will bring us a large fund; so that in the end, Mr. President, considering the bonds which we shall get from the allies and which we can market whenever we desire to do so—amounting to nearly $10,000,000,000—and considering the money we shall get by way of reparation and indemnity from our defeated foes, I think that the burden of war taxation will, in the last analysis, not be so heavy as we now sometimes think it will be.

While the bonds and reimbursements may not entirely wipe out our war expenditures, I hope, Mr. President, as the result of the marketing of these securities and the application to our indebtedness of this indemnity money, that in the course of a few years the burden of indebtedness that the United States has incurred on account of the war will be recouped, and that the people of this country can be relieved of taxes to pay these obligations in the coming years to the extent of that recoupment.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have no doubt the departments have made their estimates and recommendations to the committees of the House of Representatives and to the Secretary of the Treasury; in fact, they could not very well avoid so doing. That had to be done. I only want to repeat, however, that in the last year and a half I have had all confidence shaken in the estimates of the Treasury Department, because they have been constantly changing in the direction of greater and greater expenditures. I make the criticism most respectfully, because I know that events have been piling up in an extraordinary fashion, and perhaps no one could predict with any accuracy what the requirements would be. For the very same reason I claim that in the period to come, stored as it is with portentious possibilities, we can not count on any accuracy in these estimates.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that the Treasury Department or any of the heads of departments can, with the least approximation to accuracy, tell what the revenue requirements of the Government will be for 1920. No one can surely predict the conditions which will follow during a period so stored with great events. To just what extent taxes can be reduced in the future and by what method can not now be told. These difficult questions should be decided in the light of the latest and most complete information as to actual business conditions and revenue requirements. The only argument advanced in favor of this legislation for the future is that the taxpayer should receive certain assurances as to his situation for the following year, but it is impossible to give him any positive assurance when future conditions are entirely unknown. In any event, every business man in the country knows that the taxes imposed in this bill inevitably must come down, no matter what happens, and the only real question presented is as to the details and methods of taxation. Therefore, practically all of the minority members of the Finance Committee are united in dissenting from the 1920 provisions of the pending bill and leaving it, so far as incomes and profits are concerned, as a 1918 measure, to be amended by a subsequent Congress only when we can ascertain what the Government needs and what the country can stand.

WAR EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

I desire now, Mr. President, to discuss in detail a few of the most important and novel features of the pending revenue bill. To one of these I want to refer especially, and that is the war excess-profits tax. The plan adopted by the committee avoids the alternative scheme appearing in the House bill. I do not know that I can define better what the committee has done in this respect than to quote from the report of the committee as follows:

"The House bill provides, in effect, alternative war-profits and excess-profits taxes, the taxpayer to pay whichever is the higher. To this plan grave objection was made on constitutional grounds and because the scheme was troublesome to the taxpayer. The plan was also criticized as conferring undue discretion on the Treasury Department.

"In place of this alternative scheme the committee recommends a single war excess-profits tax, which is mathematically equivalent to an alternative plan at the same rates. It unifies the two taxes by the simple device of including the war-profits tax as an additional bracket of the rate schedule.

"The committee has also simplified and reduced the rates of the excess-profits tax adopted by the House. The rates imposed in the House bill were 35 per cent of the net income in excess of the excess-profits credit ($3,000 plus 8 per cent of the invested capital) and not in excess of 15 per cent of the invested capital; 50 per cent of the net income in excess of 15 per cent and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital; and 70 per cent of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital. The committee proposes in lieu of the House brackets of 35, 50, and 70 per cent two brackets of 30 and 60 per cent, with no change in the deduction or 'excess-profits credit.' The third bracket of the committee plan is, as stated before, simply the war-profits tax of 80 per cent."

It will thus be seen that the plan adopted by the committee avoids the alternative scheme appearing in the House bill. It will also be noted that the committee has reduced somewhat the rate to which corporations having no excess of current earnings over prewar earnings will be subject. There is retained upon the excess of earnings over prewar earnings the rate of 80 per cent. This extremely high rate, however, by no means applies to all of any corporation's income. Protective deductions have been carefully provided.

These deductions, meant to assure to corporations, free from excessive tax, some return upon the capital of every corporate enterprise, depend largely upon the computation of "invested capital." Last year's law, in which was begun the experiment of a special profits tax, made use of this invested capital conception. Variations in methods by which enterprise has been financed, in the nature of business properties, in the history of the development of different businesses, in methods of accounting, and in methods of stock issues, as well as in the relation of stock issues to bond issues, have been so great that it was found impossible to apply any single definition of invested capital. Acting under certain clauses of the law of 1917 the Treasury Department wisely worked out various relief provisions which, in the enforcement of the statutory plan, operate to prevent intolerable discrimination and excess in assessments as between taxpayers. The House bill, notwithstanding the great increase in the rates of the profits tax, did not embody a number of these protective provisions. Without attempting to go into detail I can assure the Senate that all of the protective and relief provisions worked out by the department from its actual practice have now been embodied in the bill. These relief provisions, far more necessary than before the adoption of the higher rates, will, I am sure, continue to prevent injustice as between different taxpayers and will temper the apparent severity of the letter of the law.

The question of subjecting individuals and partnerships to the war excess-profits tax was given very ample attention and consideration by the committee. Their exemption from this tax is an apparent discrimination against industry which happens to be carried on under the corporate form. I became convinced, however, that because of the high surtax rates to which individual incomes are to be subject, even where derived through partnerships, this discrimination is more apparent than real and that the difficulties of placing individuals under the tax are insuperable. I am the more reconciled to this conclusion because of my belief that in the interests of the economic and fiscal welfare of the country any special profits tax, however labeled, ought, in the near future, to be altogether abolished. In its place should be substituted some carefully worked-out scheme of general and uniform taxation upon income. The Secretary of the Treasury has urged the giving up of any vestige of the excess-profits tax in this very bill, although his recommendation has not been supported by the majority of the committee. His views, however, as to the repressive and discriminatory character of a so-called excess-profits tax are entitled to the most careful consideration.

INCOME TAX; ADEQUATE RECOGNITION OF LOSSES—SHORTAGE IN INVENTORY VALUES.

The nature of the income tax is readily understood, and it is of the new and ameliorative features only that I wish to speak. I should like now to call attention to the admirable amendments looking to adequate recognition of losses. I call attention particularly to the amendments relating to shrinkage in inventory values concerning which very many communications were received from taxpayers by the committee generally and by the individual members thereof. Under the present law income for a single year is subjected to the full rate of tax without regard to the past or future financial operations of the taxpayer. If in the previous year, however, the taxpayer now to be taxed sustained a loss instead of making a profit it is clearly unjust to tax this year's profits without letting him first make up last year's loss; and if for the next year he should show a loss instead of a gain it seems just again to permit him to apply against his previous year's income the amount by which his outgo exceeds his income. In other words, in enforcing high rates of tax there should be taken into account the taxpayer's operations over some series of years and not merely his operations for a single year in which special conditions may prevail. What is in effect averaging of income is permitted by the special provision as to net losses in section 204 of the bill.

This provision, Mr. President, was discussed yesterday afternoon in the Senate, and I do not think those who were disposed to criticize it fully understood its purport and meaning. There is no doubt that it is a very liberal provision, and that it will entail a loss of revenue; but, as I said earlier in the discussion, the loss of revenue is no argument to my mind if it is a question of gross inequality and inequity, or if the revenue is to be raised by taxing a man who has suffered only losses, and I am glad that the Senate sustained the committee and retained this paragraph in the bill. Why, Mr. President, even with this provision in the measure, much anxiety still prevails all over the country upon other questions of losses, and I ought to say here that these provisions are not in the interest of the so-called very large corporations. They produce under the most favorable conditions and do not have the lean years. These relief provisions to which I am about to refer are distinctly and preeminently in favor of the small taxpayer from one end of the land to the other. The great concerns could proceed on their way very cheerfully without any of these provisions; but it is the average man doing business, whether as a dealer or as a manufacturer, who has his inventories of stock or who requires relief along other lines to which I shall now refer, for whom these relief measures are intended. There was no occult purpose in devising them to enable anyone to escape taxes, or to favor any class of industry, individuals, or section of the country. The man dealing in wheat in the West, or keeping a grocery store in a small town on the plains, is perhaps more directly and keenly interested in this and the other relief provisions than the great, big concerns in metropolitan centers.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PENROSE. I will.

Mr. GRONNA. There were two questions debated yesterday, if I remember correctly. The first one was the question of making the inventory. Of course, as I understood, there was really no objection to the change in regard to that.

Mr. PENROSE. I had no objection. I do not know whether the Senate adopted the Senator's amendment or not. I do not recall.

Mr. GRONNA. I withdrew my amendment for the present because I was assured that the amendment proposed by the committee would in effect take care of the matter. But I rose to call the attention of the Senator to this fact. I know he does no intentionally wish to confuse the two subjects.

Mr. PENROSE. No.

Mr. GRONNA. There are really two distinct and separate subjects: The question of taking the inventory based upon a fair valuation or a market valuation is one, and the question of being permitted to make reductions on losses sustained in the years past is a distinct and separate question, as I understood it.

Mr. PENROSE. I think I understood the Senator from North Dakota, and in making this brief reference to the opposition which occurred yesterday I did not mean in any way to oppose the Senator's amendment, nor did I have the Senator's amendment in mind, I may say. I had more in mind the actual vote which occurred on the question of sustaining the committee when some 15 or 16 Senators saw fit, as was their right, to vote against the committee. I only wanted to say that I feared the character of the amendment, by reason of the bref debate in the absence of full explanation and statistics, might not have been fully understood, as is often the case.

Mr. GRONNA. As the Senator knows, there was no vote taken on the amendment which provided for making reduction in the inventory; that is, there was no objection to it. The objection was to another section which provides that any losses sustained in past years may be deducted in the future.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, no doubt, my reference was a little misleading. I should have said that objections to measures of relief of this peculiar character, perhaps, have not been fully understood, and hence there arose the suggestion of criticism to an amendment of this kind. That is what I should have said to make myself clear.

Many taxpayers, however, have expressed a fear that this new provision does not fully prevent injustice through taxing profits largely dependent upon inventories of goods at war prices when the value of these goods may suffer a sharp decline. The committee could not agree to permit reserves necessarily arbitrary against inventory values, but did provide, in section 214 (9) and 234 (13), that if after any year's profit has been calculated a loss is for the first time ascertained, due to the shrinkage in the level of inventory values or other similar cause, there may immediately be an adjustment of the tax for the past year, allowing full recognition of this loss, even though not sustained through actual sales.

Another source of anxiety, Mr. President, among the taxpayers of the country—and upon al lthese questions every Member of this body has had hundreds, if not thousands, of letters expressing the anxiety of the taxpayers—is that a very grave injustice should not be done by taxing earnings and income which really do not have any existence.

AMORTIZATION.

A source of much anxiety to concerns which have attempted to respond to the need of the country, and even upon the demand of the Government for increased production of articles contributing to the prosecution of the war, is the losses which they face through the shrinkage in value of equipment and plants acquired at unprecedented cost and likely to prove of little or no value under established peace conditions. The House bill provided that in determining the taxable income of such concerns there might be deducted from gross income reasonable allowances for such shrinkage in value estimated or actually sustained. In the House bill this allowance was, without apparent justification, limited to 25 per cent of the net income otherwise taxable.

Why the limitation, Mr. President, if still further loss were incurred over and above the 25 per cent limitation? So the Committee on Finance struck out the 25 per cent limitation, and the striking out of this limitation by the committee permits full recognition of the so-called amortization requirements and will tend to prevent the assessment of apparent profits which, in fact, are used to pay for facilities of only passing value.

There is another question which gravely disturbed the business men of the country. As I have said, many of these questions were comparatively unimportant while these taxes were low, but now that they have reached such staggering dimensions it became imperative to do something in the direction of meeting the questions which arose.

DEPLETION.

The committee gave very careful consideration to the question of depletion. The just taxation of incomes derived from the operation of mines and of oil and gas wells is a particularly difficult matter. This is due to the fact that part of what apparently is income is in reality a mere return of the capital of the enterprise. When, for example, a ton of coal is sold the excess of what is received from the cost of mining of that ton of coal is by no means all income; part of that excess must be treated as a repayment of what was invested in the mine from which the coal was taken. Such allowances for the extractive industries are covered by the depletion provision. The committee changed the language of this provision to assure continuance of the recognition of valuation of deposits as of March 1, 1913, as the basis for the deduction in the case of all property acquired by the taxpayer on or before that date. In pursuance of a policy permitting, so far as practicable, the development of new resources of this character they also provide for a more liberal allowance than heretofore permitted in the case of newly discovered mines, or oil or gas wells, permitting the deduction to be based on the fair market value of property discovered instead of its cost.

CONSOLIDATED RETURNS.

A very important provision worked out by the Treasury Department in its administration of the excess-profits tax for the past year, but which was expressly rejected by the House, is that relating to consolidated returns. In carrying on its business in different States, and also in carrying on different but closely related lines of business, it has been found necessary to employ the medium of a number of different corporations, substantially all of the stock of which is held by one company or by the controlling individuals. It is impossible to determine the true profits of such a combined enterprise except by treating the enterprise as a unit and disregarding the incidental placing of different branches in legally separate corporations. Nonrecognition of this unity in getting at true income may prevent the Government from subjecting the full income to tax or may result in subjecting the enterprise to undue tax. The committee has, therefore, embodied a provision requiring consolidated returns of income of affiliated corporations. Such returns are to be used not merely for the purpose of calculating profits tax but for the purpose of calculating the 12 per cent income tax. This section represents a determination to deal justly with business, whatever its form of organization, and to prevent business from escaping just tax by shifts in its form of organization.

NO DIFFERENTIAL TAX ON CORPORATE INCOME.

The committee could not be persuaded that there was any justification in the differential tax on corporate income. The provision of the House bill imposing an 18 per cent rate upon all of a corporation's net income, except the portion used for the distribution of dividends, for the payment of indebtedness, and investment in Liberty bonds, was entirely objectionable. It would have operated to put a premium on improvident and reckless corporate management, and to subject to penalty those conservative methods of business administration which have characterized the most wisely handled corporations. It was a direct tax upon corporate thrift. The committee has wisely abolished this differential and restored a flat rate of tax upon corporate incomes.

INHERITANCE TAX.

The taxing of estates is, to my mind, properly a matter for the States and not for the United States Government. The States are faced with the burden of raising more revenue than ever before. Sooner or later the collision between the States and the Federal Government in the field of jurisdiction over taxation is bound to become serious. I was impressed with this thought when I referred to the situation in a speech I made in the Senate in the summer of 1916 upon the then pending revenue bill, when I called attention to the situation which was then already developing. I will ask the Secretary to read a brief quotation from my remarks at that time on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"The States of the Union and the large municipalities therein all require large revenues for purposes not thought of a few years ago. Our municipalities are nearly all heavily in debt, and are in most cases restricted to a limited field of taxation. The municipal needs, however, are ever enlarging in a constantly increasing ratio without any prospect of relief from debt or the securing of revenue to meet the demands necessary for projects in the interest of the health and well-being of the citizens. The States themselves and the cities therein are called upon to maintain elaborate boards of health, systems of sewage disposal, continually increasing requirements of educational and eleemosynary institutions, and, over and above all, to cite one instance of development to an extraordinary degree of magnitude in the last few years, the imperative demand for good roads has caused an expenditure running into a staggering amount of money in the aggregate from one end of the country to the other.

"Now the States are expressly excluded by the Constitution from levying duties or imposts, and are obliged to resort to the various well-known forms of State taxation of a direct character. The Federal Government, under the doctrines recently advanced that no taxes should be imposed upon articles of consumption and, apparently, that as little revenue as possible should be collected from imports, encroaches upon the field of direct taxation belonging to the States and abandons a source of revenue from the customhouse to which the Government has the exclusive right. This seems to me illogical in principle and unfair in practice. The ultimate effect necessarily following is that the State revenues will be greatly limited, if not impoverished, and the outlook for many of our municipalities from a financial point of view is not very hopeful."

Mr. PENROSE. The situation now, of course, is very much worse than it was in 1916, when direct taxes were comparatively light. If the Federal Government keeps on piling up taxes and infringing upon the tax domain of the States one result must inevitably follow, and that is that the Government ultimately will become wholly centralized and State governments will become practically abolished or rendered ineffective for lack of revenue. Projects like road building, which the States will no longer be able to maintain, will have to be assumed by the Federal Government and the whole spirit and structure of American institutions will be altered, if not destroyed. I am one of those who still retain a respect for State sovereignty, and for the maintenance of the integrity and activities of the States. The country is too big now, and will soon become very much too big, to render it in any way safe to maintain a centralized Government over our continental domain. The safety valve for our institutions and our development is to be found in the maintenance of the sovereign States with their powers and jurisdiction. These questions of vital moment must be met at an early date, and the sooner we meet the issue by dropping from Federal revenue laws, as a preliminary of good faith and fair purpose toward the States, the Federal taxes on inheritances, the quicker will the Federal Government give an assurance of a disposition to finally adjust these questions of divided authority upon equitable lines.

The Federal Government, of course, has little to do with the transmission of the estate. The heir of the decedent finds his only title to the possession of the estate in the laws of the State, and he only secures the transmission of it through the courts and other officials of the State. Hence, this tax technically and preeminently belongs to the States, and if we are to begin upon some program by which the States may have jurisdiction over some taxable matters, not interfered with by the Federal Government, let us begin now with the inheritance taxes, where the justification therefor is admitted from every legal and practical point of view. Moreover, even at the best, the inheritance taxes, especially if heavy, are bad from an economic point of view because they are a tax on capital and not on income, and it is generally admitted not to be sound policy to tax capital but only income. Moreover, the multiplication of these inheritance taxes tends to destroy altogether properties built up by lives of hard productive effort and which are industrially essential. The tax subtracts from the capital account of the country, and if carried too far will tend largely to destroy any incentive for individual initiative or enterprise. The only argument I have heard advanced in favor of it as a tax for the Federal Government under normal conditions is that most of the fortunes in the country are the result of gains from enterprises scattered all over the country, but if this is to be an argument for Federal taxation it would apply equally as well to the owner of a corner lot in a city or to a farmer who sells his grain. There is hardly a municipality in the country where real estate values are not increased by the general growth of the whole country and the increase of population, and clearly the western farmer sells his grain wherever he can find a market, and his farm products naturally increase in value with the growth of populous centers, the increase in industry, and the greater demand thereby created. The fact is that if there is any justification for the tax at all at this time it is found only in the argument that we have been through a war and have still many great expenses to meet, due to demobilization, and the Government needs the money. Therefore, these taxes may be temporarily tolerated even if they do come on top of State taxes already in many cases large.

I am calling attention to these facts, and I suppose that under the circumstances these taxes will remain in the bill. Such a tax was used at the time of the Civil War and at the time of the Spanish War and, as I have said, may be defensible on the ground of the war. I do maintain, however, that if there is to be any tax the rate should depend not on the size of the estate as a whole, as it does under the present law and in the House bill, but so far as possible on the amount of the individual share of each person participating in the division of the estate. The new inheritance tax plan which the committee has worked out is much fairer and sounder than the estate tax plan in the House bill. The rates adopted in the House bill mean nothing short of confiscation and destruction. To pay to the Government 40 per cent of the amount of an estate would often mean that to raise this amount of money the other 60 per cent of the estate would have to be sacrificed and lost altogether. In any case the difficulty of settling an estate within a reasonable time after the death of the decedent frequently is very great and, in some instances, nearly insurmountable. Undeveloped enterprise, largely dependent upon the genius of the promoter, and forming a considerable part of a large estate, not to mention real estate and many other assets which can not be immediately disposed of without a very great loss, illustrate in a general way the difficulties encountered in bringing about any settlement in order to adjust taxes within any reasonable period. The rates adopted in the committee amendment are more of an approach to reason, and provision has been made for more liberality in the time of paying these taxes.

Public institutions and charities have been hard hit by the war. In this country educational and charitable institutions carry on in a large measure what essentially is public work. That our educational and charitable institutions have been largely founded and maintained by individual gift and bequest has been widely commented upon by publicists in every land. In this respect we differ much from older countries where State appropriations have largely aided in this work. That in the United States they have been built by private enterprise furnishes a peculiar illustration of the qualities in American civilization which have made our country great. Contributors to these institutions have been remarkably loyal but under war conditions and with the high rates of income tax they could hardly have been expected to have done as well as in times of peace. The provision of the committee inheritance tax amendment exempting from tax transfers to the Government or for any religious, charitable, or scientific purpose is to be commended particularly. The Government of the United States should not collect a cent of tax by reason of the death of any soldier or sailor. A man who dies for his country should not have to divide with his country his estate. The committee amendment properly exempts the property of soldiers and sailors.

CONSUMPTION TAX.

I shall refer briefly to the consumption or sales tax, so that some idea may be had of the character of these schedules. The committee fortunately found that the financial needs of the Government would not require the raising of $8,000,000,000 but would be satisfied with a $6,000,000,000 bill. This reduction to my mind furnishes a very striking illustration of the wisdom of the deliberation and care with which the committee considered the measure. It had been freely predicted by the Treasury Department early in the summer that unless the bill passed by September 28 the liberty loan would fail. Instead of any such prediction being fulfilled the loan was oversubscribed and the taxpayers of the country have been saved $2,000,000,000 of taxes, which would have been imposed upon them had haste been the order of the day. The fact that only $6,000,000,000 was found to be required after the armistice gave the committee some leeway in adjusting many of the taxes, although the opportunity for such reduction was not so great as would appear, because the revenue loss due to prohibitory legislation was estimated to amount to at least $1,000,000,000 for a full year after prohibition becomes effective; but even with this circumstance the committee was able to do something to relieve the burdens of the bill. The committee reduced the proposed rates on tobacco by, roughly, 25 per cent below the rates in the House bill. Tobacco is a recognized subject for taxation, and has been one of the stable sources of revenue in all civilized governments for many years. I believe the rates in the House bill had been raised beyond the maximum revenue-producing point and would have curtailed and unsettled the industry. More revenue will be raised at the reduced rate, on account of the greater consumption.

The committee struck out the new tax on gasoline, and left to the States, which maintain the roads, many of which have been destroyed by the use of Government trucks and vehicles, the field of the automobile license tax. The committee further eliminated the 20 per cent tax on many articles of clothing and apparel. As a further example of the committee's reductions, the tax on the manufacture of automobiles was made 5 per cent instead of 10; on pianos and organs, 5 per cent instead of 10; on chewing gum, 3 per cent instead of 6, while the tax was entirely struck out on some of the proposed new subjects of taxation, such as contained in section 905.

The committee, on the other hand, retained the 3 per cent tax on freight charges, the 8 per cent tax on passenger charges, the 10 per cent tax on admissions and dues, and not only retained but increased somewhat the taxes on certain lines of manufacture while retaining the stamp taxes and increasing some of the miscellaneous special taxes on different occupations. This course seemed wise and just. When the Government comes to raise billions by taxation it is essential that it rely upon more than one method of taxation. Just now the tariff can not play the part it did in former times. Taxes on sales, freight bills, and theater tickets do, however, operate to spread out this tax burden. When the attempt is made to raise by tax on incomes $4,600,000,000, a very great if not too much reliance and weight are put on one form of taxation. Continued for more than one year such rates of tax would endanger the whole social and industrial fabric. It is, therefore, absolutely essential, in my judgment, to use and retain beside the income tax other methods of raising the enormous amount of revenue.

MEASURE RESULT OF CAREFUL THOUGHT.

I have already referred to the admirable character and work of the Tax Advisory Board. Other administrative features also received careful study by the committee. Every effort was made to make the law clear, and capable of prompt and just enforcement. Of course, I do not maintain, as I have already stated, that this measure is by any means perfect. I do say, however, that it has received more careful thought by far than any previous internal revenue bill in this country, and that it is more clearly and consistently drafted, and supplied with wiser administrative provisions than any other measure. I can not disguise the fact that I feel anxious as to the effect upon the country of the attempt to apply such higher rates of income and profits taxes as are provided in this bill. It is to be remembered that all this weight of Federal taxation comes on top of the enormous levies of State, municipal, and other taxation, the burden of which I had occasion to refer to at length during the consideration of past revenue bills in this body. Yet, in their application upon incomes and profits for the war year the only limit to Federal rates that I recognize is dictated by the necessity of preserving our idustrial fabric from stagnation and even destruction. With the demobilization of our Army and the return of our 2,000,000 soldiers, it is, of course, imperative to maintain industrial activity unimpaired, if only for the purpose of furnishing employment. My belief is, however, that the collection of such taxes for the past year only, at the rates fixed by the bill, will probably in most cases not injure or destroy the business or financial structure, although ruin would result from a continuance of such rates in future years.

I am also convinced from interviews and communications on the part of several thousand taxpayers from all sections of the country during the consideration of this bill that the great body of intelligent and patriotic business men and taxpayers throughout the land are willing to accept these rates and desire the measure passed. I have never heard a suggestion or utterance from them which was not keyed in the note of highest patriotism and willingness to make every sacrifice. The war has terminated with success far beyond our expectations. The taxpayers of the country will experience the patriotic satisfaction that the revenue which they will pay will have gone toward contributing to this success. They know that the manhood of the country has paid a price infinitely beyond any that can be measured in money, and they are willing for the year of the war to show some of that spirit of sacrifice which has animated and distinguished our Army.

TARIFF ASPECTS.

I have not touched upon the tariff question in my effort to explain as concisely as may be my views upon the bill. My chief difficulty has been to condense. The materials at hand are so voluminous and the subject of such an encyclopaedic character, involving questions which strike at the very roots of the industrial system, that it would be impossible within any reasonable limits to discuss these questions in the way I would like and as their vital character would justify. They are full of significance and interest, fraught with importance to our reconstruction program, but their fuller discussion must await another day. I will say, however, that it was obvious to everyone, including consistent protectionists, that in the revenue bills coming up for consideration since the beginning of the war in Europe it has been impracticable to consider a protective tariff. The whole world has been upset and the normal course of trade, domestic and international, has been diverted from its natural channels. To have raised a portion of the revenue by a general ad valorem or specific duty on imports would not have contributed any substantial amount of revenue compared with the vast sums required, and naturally would have caused grave embarrassment to those engaged in manufactures into which these imported products entered. Further, in the midst of these upset conditions and in the limited time permitted for providing for our urgent financial needs, together with the diversity of opinion which, naturally, prevailed in the last three Congresses as constituted, it seemed obvious to everyone that it would be impossible to carry out a protective tariff scheme by levying a compensatory duty all along the line up to the finished product, without which a protective tariff is injurious and destructive.

Hence, I think nearly everyone conversant with the situation, no matter how consistent and strong his theories on protection for American capital and labor have been, has exhibited common sense and conservatism in not even attempting the discussion of these questions. The country has submitted cheerfully to a very heavy burden of taxation new and without precedent, and not alleviated by revenues which, ordinarily, would come from the customhouse. But I want to refer in passing to the fact that had it not been for the protective policy of the United States for a period, with slight interruption, of nearly 60 years we would not have had established that vast industrial system, built upon firm foundations, capable of meeting every requirement, and which has enabled us to furnish promptly to an incredible extent the munitions of war for the allies and for ourselves. It is well to pay a passing tribute to the splendid achievements in the field of American industry and to express the hope that at the proper time a tariff system will be adopted which will maintain all American activities intact and prosperous from one end of the country to the other.

INDUSTRIAL MIGHT DEVELOPED THROUGH TARIFF.

Next to our armies, the industrial might of America won the war. We must continue the same policy, especially as to war essentials, but, after all, everything is essential that contributes to our economic independence if we are to be prepared for war. I take it that hereafter almost everybody will advocate a proper protective tariff for the reconstruction and preparedness of the American people. In this legislation, however, we must await developments and be prepared to maintain America's industrial independence and uphold American standards of civilization as against all the world. We must, above all, in coming to our final conclusions on a fiscal policy, reduce expenses. Economy must be the watchword; curtailment, retrenchment, and careful legislative checks on expenditures must be the practice. We must demobilize our armies to the lowest limit of our continuing responsibilities. We must return to our national and hereditary vocation. All commerce and industry, prompted as they may be by ambition for personal gain, profit, and advancement, ultimately and really constitute the development of the arts and sciences, the elevation of the standards of men and women, the promotion of civilization, and the achievement through peaceful channels of the destiny of the human race.

EARLY PASSAGE OF BILL URGED.

Undoubtedly many defects in the bill will have to be provided for by remedial legislation in the future based on experience. It seems, however, to be the best measure that can be had at this time and unquestionably it is better than any preceding law. It is earnestly to be hoped that the bill will pass promptly. The suggestion has been made that if it fails perhaps the situation can be met by amending the present law for war-profits taxes, which procedure might meet the requirements. The fatal difficulty of this suggestion is, however, that the very valuable relief provisions in the pending bill would be lost. These provisions are, in my opinion, of inestimable value, and the more the taxpayer comes to know their full effect the more satisfaction he will feel. Moreover, it must be borne in mind that taxation has reached its peak. It is hoped that hereafter revenue bills will provide for steadily decreasing taxes. Profits taxes ought to steadily decrease and very soon disappear, and sufficient revenue for the conduct of the Government ought to be raised by a system of flat income taxes.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I had intended, yet, as I have said, it is extremely difficult to know where to stop or how to condense on a subject so absorbing and comprehensive as is this revenue question.

AMERICAN DEMOCRACY MET EVERY REQUIREMENT OF WAR.

I should like to say in closing, however, that when we consider how successfully we have gone through this war we can approach the future in full confidence, notwithstanding the many difficulties confronting us. Who can fail to be impressed with the magnificent way in which the American democracy has met every requirement? The united strength of the country has supported the war. We had in our midst elements from almost every nation in the world, many affiliated by ties of blood and even birth with the nations with whom we were at war, and yet, notwithstanding a vigorous and extensive enemy propaganda, especially among our alien population, the extent of disloyalty and disaffection has been quite small. In many of our largest munitions plants—I know it is the case in Pennsylvania, and I believe it is so elsewhere—a great proportion of the workers came from enemy countries and they have been among the most loyal and devoted. In fact, it would seem as if the great bulk of these people, perhaps not all of them as yet absorbed in what is called the American crucible, fully realize the value of the civil and religious liberty which they came here to enjoy. They have not only filled our munitions plants, but they have been found in full share in our Army.

Public sentiment has dictated the general policy of the war. It is a long journey from being too proud to fight, through the transition period of peace without victory, to the unconditional surrender and the armistice. Volunteer boards composed of our greatest men in industry and finance have saved a situation which otherwise would have been marked by inefficiency.

Perhaps the most notable achievement, exciting the astonishment of other countries, was our ability to pass the conscription law within a few weeks, a proposition abhorrent to every American tradition and sentiment, yet cheerfully acquiesced in and carried out while England only partially applied conscription, Australia failed altogether, and Canada only succeeded at a recent period in the war. In lesser detail many false economic and ill-advised methods were adopted, and autocratic powers unwarranted were exercised to the harassment and vexation of the business world and most of the people. Yet the robust and sturdy strength of the American body, politic and industrial, withstood the bandages and panaceas of quacks and theorists, and was strong enough to achieve victory regardless of obstacles.

In view of the splendid achievements of a united people, brought about by an appeal to their intelligence and their patriotism, every American can experience restored confidence in the competence of an enlightened and intelligent democracy, and need have no fear that in this country, at least, there will at any time arise conditions in any way approximating those existing elsewhere, but that we will be fully able to solve the problems to come in the same intelligent and patriotic fashion in which we have succeeded in meeting the issues under the stress of the war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand the pending amendment is the one found on page 11, beginning in line 10 and ending in line 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment begins on page 11, line 3, where the committee proposes to strike out and insert.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to ask that the amendment be divided, and that the first clause of the amendment, beginning on page 11, line 10, and going down to line 14, be first voted on, and that then subdivision (b), beginning on line 15 and going down to and including line 19, be voted upon separately.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the suggestion I made before the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] began his speech. I think this is hardly the proper time to pass upon the 1920 provisions as a part of that general amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember, having been reminded by the Senator from North Carolina, that he did make a suggestion that subdivision (b) of the pending amendment go over; and that was perfectly satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Utah that this is an amendment to strike out and to insert, and therefore is not a divisible question. If the first part of the paragraph goes over it will all have to go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Therefore I ask that the whole amendment be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

SEC. 212. (a) That in the case of an individual the term "net income" means the gross income as defined in section 213, less the deductions allowed by section 214.

(b) The net income shall be computed upon the basis of the taxpayer's annual accounting period (fiscal year or calendar year, as the case may be) in accordance with the method of accounting regularly employed in keeping the books of such taxpayer; but if no such method of accounting has been so employed, or if the method employed does not clearly reflect the income, the computation shall be made upon such basis and in such manner as in the opinion of the commissioner does clearly reflect the income. If the taxpayer's annual accounting period is other than a fiscal year as defined in section 200 or if the taxpayer has no annual accounting period or does not keep books, the net income shall be computed on the basis of the calendar year.

If a taxpayer changes his accounting period from fiscal year to calendar year, from calendar year to fiscal year, or from one fiscal year to another, the net income shall, with the approval of the commissioner, be computed on the basis of such new accounting period, subject to the provisions of section 226.

(12) If it is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner that during the taxable year 1919 or 1920 the taxpayer (a) has for the first time ascertained the amount of a loss sustained during the preceding taxable year and not deducted from the gross income therefor, or (b) has sustained a substantial loss (whether or not actually realized by sale or other disposition), resulting from any material reduction (not due to temporary fluctuation) of the value of the inventory for the preceding taxable year, then the amount of such loss shall be deducted from the net income for such preceding taxable year, and the taxes imposed by this title and by Title III for such year shall be redetermined accordingly. Any amount found to be due to the taxpayer upon the basis of such redetermination shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 252.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, this is one of the relief sections. Yesterday I asked some questions concerning the construction of this section, but did not pursue the inquiry at that time, preferring to wait until the amendment came up for consideration; but I wanted to ask with reference to subdivision (b) of this paragraph.

Several of the members of the committee yesterday stated that in their opinion the construction of this subdivision was that it did not in anywise relate to a loss actually sustained during the preceding taxable year, but did relate to a loss actually sustained during the taxable year in question. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, or any member of it, whether that is correct. The preceding paragraph relates clearly to a loss sustained, but not ascertained, during the previous year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that that is, in effect, the contention I made on yesterday, and I am entirely satisfied of its correctness. It refers to a loss sustained in the previous year, but not determined until later, in the sense that the profits reflected in the inventory upon the basis of which the taxable income was ascertained and assessed as the result of the shrinkage in the values of the inventoried assets have not been realized and the tax has been collected upon a false estimate of values and income. When this situation is disclosed the amendment authorizes a redetermination of the income and the resulting tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I want to say again——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me finish what I was going to say.

Since making that statement I have referred to a statement which I have in the annotations that I have made upon this bill which relates to this very matter, and I see that it confirms me. The annotation reads as follows:

> The matter of anticipated losses through the shrinkage in value of inventories from the present high level received much attention from the committee. It was believed that the provision in regard to net losses, section 204, above, might afford relief in certain cases.
> In order, however, to afford more prompt relief in case it should be discovered within a relatively short time after the close of a taxable year that a loss had been sustained resulting from a material reduction in the value of the inventory or other similar cause, provision was made that the amount of the loss then discovered may be deducted from the net income of the preceding taxable year, any amount of taxes thus found to have been overpaid to be promptly refunded.

That is the substance of what I stated yesterday, Mr. President; and, in my judgment, that is the clear, unmistakable meaning of this section.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want the Senator from Wisconsin to know that I do not agree with that proposition at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator so stated yesterday.

Mr. SMOOT. And if the Senator says that that is what this means—that I want this provision changed—but the reading of it does not say that at all. I want the Senate to understand that this is what it says:

First—and the reason why there are two subdivisions of it is because there are two separate and distinct propositions—the first one is that during the taxable year 1919 or 1920, if there is ascertained the amount of a loss that may be sustained then——

Mr. SIMMONS. That is not the subdivision the Senator from Wisconsin was talking about.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read the next one, if the Senator will wait. I called attention to the fact that there were two subdivisions, "(a)" and "(b)." The first one is where there is a loss that has been ascertained, not for the year 1918 but for the year 1919 or 1920. Subdivision "(b)" is where it has actually been sustained during those years, not any other years. Now, if the Senator's answer is correct, we go back here to 1918; and that was never the intention of the committee, or, at any rate, it was never my intention as a member of the committee, and I do not so construe this subdivision or this amendment.

I want that statement to be in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator loses sight of the fact that the two subdivisions contemplate entirely different classes of losses. The first subdivision relates to any loss that was actually sustained during 1919 and 1920, of any kind or character, but was not known at the time, was not discovered until a later date; and in that case, very properly, it is provided that the taxpayer may have the benefit of that fact when the loss is actually discovered.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right in that statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is general. That is not restricted by any language whatsoever. It applies to any loss of any character or kind whatsoever.

Mr. THOMAS. But only to the preceding taxable year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, yes; of course, to the preceding taxable year.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, section (b) refers to losses resulting under specified conditions. It deals with a specific loss incurred in a specified way, to wit, it in effect provides that if during the succeeding taxable year it is ascertained that there has been a shrinkage in inventory values by reason of the fact that the assets were valued at a price basis which subsequent market conditions disclose was not justified, and as the result of this shrinkage it becomes apparent that the taxpayer has paid the income taxes during the preceding year upon a larger income than he actually earned, he shall be reimbursed for the loss thus sustained.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a minute. If the inventory, based upon either the cost price or the market value, whichever is the lower, reflects a profit which a subsequent shrinkage in prices or values shows to have been fictitious, and as a result a loss is sustained, this section enables the taxpayer to have his taxable income for the preceding year redetermined and provides for appropriate reimbursement.

Mr. SMOOT. Now the Senator has got it right.

Mr. SIMMONS. To have his inventory corrected, so as to reflect the value as shown as a result of this shrinkage; and when it is determined in that way then he recoups himself from the taxes paid in that year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to say that the statement just made by the Senator is correct, as I understand it; but the statement he just made is exactly the reverse of the statement he made before.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think so at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, we will let the RECORD show.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have read what I said in the RECORD, and I did not change a word of it, and it sustains absolutely the statement I have made here.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I mean the RECORD to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not discussed this matter to-day. It was on yesterday that we discussed it.

Mr. SMOOT. I refer to the Senator's first statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon. He meant my statement made a little while ago?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I agree with the construction that is now given by the chairman. That brings me to the question which I really desired to ask, and that is, in the case that he now has illustrated, whether that loss would not be reflected in the return for the present year?

In other words, here is an inventory made upon the first of January, and a shrinkage has resulted in a loss during the taxable year then following. Now, why is not that loss fully taken care of and represented in the return, without being carried back into the taxable year?

Mr. SIMMONS. That loss would not be reflected in the present year.

Mr. LENROOT. Why not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, if I understand the Senator, taking care of the losses of that year does not provide recoupment for an overcharge for the previous year. There was an overvaluation of assets in the inventory of the previous year showing a taxable income which was not actually earned, and as a result the taxpayer was overtaxed. The purpose of this section is to reimburse him.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but now the Senator says that he still has the goods. He may or may not have the goods. He is entitled to the relief of this subdivision (b), whether the goods have been sold or not. The goods may have been sold; they may have been sold at a less price than that indicated in the inventory; and if they are sold for a less price than that indicated in the inventory, for the life of me I can not see why it is not reflected in the return for the present year and why he does not receive the benefit of that loss. If I can put one more question to the Senator, I think I will make myself clear.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me see if I understand the Senator. Of course, if you start at the beginning of the new year with the inventory of the previous year, without correction in the way I have indicated, then your inventory at the end of the year might not properly reflect your profits; but what I say is that in a case of that sort, when you discover that your inventory of the previous year was made upon a false basis and that is corrected, then you correct the inventory at the beginning of the year upon which profits are estimated in conjunction with the inventory at the close of the year.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, let me see if I can put a case that will make my understanding of it a little clearer. Suppose the goods have not been disposed of. On the 1st of January an inventory is made, which is the basis of the relief provided by this section. The goods are not disposed of at all, and 12 months later a new inventory is made at the prices then prevailing, the value of which is very much less than the inventory of the year preceding. Now, will not that be reflected in the return for the current year? Will he not receive credit for that loss in the value of the inventory, measuring the difference between the value of the inventory on January 1 of one year and January 1 of the succeeding year?

Mr. SIMMONS. I had assumed that there would be no difficulty in the taxpayer in the succeeding year correcting his inventory to conform to the corrections that were made for the purpose of getting a rebate in his taxes. This corrected inventory is the basis upon which he starts the year's business—this inventory which shows the true value of his assets after they have suffered this shrinkage. Now, starting from that basis, he may make a profit during that year or he may make a loss during that year; and the profit or loss of that year will be reflected in the inventory made at the termination of the year. Is that what the Senator means?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but the Senator assumes in subdivision "(b)" that there is an error in the inventory concerning which there is a shrinkage in the value of it. I do not so read this section or so construe it. The inventory may have been absolutely accurate at the time it was made; but thereafter, through a falling of values, there may have been a shrinkage in the value of the goods represented by that inventory. If there be that shrinkage, as I read this, he is entitled to the benefits of this subdivision. That does not relate to the preceding taxable year at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator this question: Will he not discover, before his next taxes are due, this shrinkage, this loss? And when he discovers that loss, he will be at once permitted to correct the inventory.

Mr. LENROOT. Why should he, when he has the fullest opportunity in making the return for the current year and paying his taxes for that year to have that included and taken care of, and it will be reflected, it seems to me, in his return?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I assume that this is the situation: Suppose that during the succeeding year the taxpayer discovers that he has sustained a loss in the preceding year which is not reflected in his inventory of that year, because he did not then know of the loss, and for that reason his taxes are redetermined, and it is found that his inventory was incorrect. I do not say that fundamentally it was incorrect in the sense that it did not properly reflect cost price or the market value; but it is determined not to reflect the values upon which his income tax ought to be based, and he is permitted, for the purposes of the tax of the preceding year, to re-form it. Now, when he comes to make his inventory for the succeeding year, I do not conceive that he would base his inventory upon the prices at which they were inventoried in the previous year—prices that he had been permitted to set aside, prices which the department had reformed in this process of redetermination. His inventory as to assets brought over would take into consideration the shrinkage they had sustained as the result of falling value since the last inventory period.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose the goods had been sold and disposed of, so that they would not be and could not be included in any subsequent inventory?

Mr. SIMMONS. The goods must have been sold if the shrinkage occurred after the current year. They must have been sold after the current year. They must have been sold in the next year; but it does not make any difference in my mind whether the goods are sold or not, if, as a matter of fact, they were overestimated.

Mr. LENROOT. But suppose they were not overestimated?

Mr. SIMMONS. But for the purposes of this redetermination we take them as having been overestimated.

Mr. LENROOT. There is nothing in the section that places any such limitation upon it—certainly not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. The very provision itself is based upon the idea that the inventory has shrunk.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but it may have shrunk after the preceding taxable year. There is the difficulty.

Mr. SIMMONS. It must have shrunk after the inventory was taken.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me the answer to the Senator is a simple one, and I do not think we ought to dodge it if we are going to support the amendment.

Let me say to the Senator that the answer to it is this: If there has been a shrinkage and the shrinkage is determined and an allowance made, it can not be deducted again; so, whatever the shrinkage may be, he can only receive credit for it once. That, it seems to me, is the answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was what I was endeavoring to make plain.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be true; but if it can be taken care of in the current year, then it seems to me the only possible reason there can be for subdivision (b) might be where the net income or the gross income was so low as not to permit full credit for that loss—in other words, where the deduction might be greater than the income—so that it would be necessary to carry it into the preceding year to give him the relief.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but I want to say to the Senator it would not be fair to the Government on one hand or the merchant on the other to have it carried to the year he suggested. The loss must be, as the amendment says, actually sustained, and I will state the reason why it is given that way and the division made. The taxes for this year will no doubt be higher than they will at any other time in the history of the country, and if the loss is sustained this year and in the future a credit is allowed it ought to be at the rate of taxation of this year. If the loss shall be sustained, say, in the year 1920, the merchant ought not to be allowed the rate of taxation provided in 1918, but it will be on the taxes provided for the calendar year 1919.

Mr. LENROOT. It ought to be for the year in which the loss is sustained, ought it not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not under the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me state the case again. I may be very dense, but it seems to me entirely clear that the entire loss may be sustained in a current year, but under subdivision (b) that loss will be carried back and treated as a loss sustained during the preceding year, when it was not sustained during that year at all.

Mr. SMOOT. The answer to that is, I will say to the Senator, that if he has paid the rate of taxation of 1918 on an inflated inventory, why should he be compelled for the calendar year 1919 to receive only credit at the lower rate of taxation? The amendment is drawn in order to take care of just such a case.

Mr. LENROOT. But subdivision (a) takes care of that kind of a case?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. LENROOT. Where a loss is ascertained for the first time, but which really occurred during the preceding year.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it says "the amount of a loss sustained during the preceding taxable year and not deducted from the gross income therefor" during that year.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator speaks of that kind of a loss, and, of course, that is correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. I fail to understand the Senator from Wisconsin. I can not see in this provision anything except a provision to correct an inventory and to pay the tax according to the corrected inventory.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say merely a word in relation to the statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin just before the Senator from North Carolina rose. The loss was not sustained until after the reduction in the goods had been ascertained. The loss that will be sustained can not be ascertained until after this year.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I said was that when it is ascertained that there was a loss, then all this provision does is to permit the taxpayer, through the Treasury Department, to correct his inventory of the previous year so as to reflect that loss; that is all.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me ask the Senator if his attention has been called to this kind of a case: We will say that on the 1st of January next an inventory is made, the value of which, according to the return, is $100,000. We will say that that is the actual value based either upon cost or market value, if that is lower. Can there be any mistake in that inventory to correct?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I am assuming that it is either the actual value or cost.

Mr. SMOOT. Whichever is the lowest.

Mr. LENROOT. Whichever is the lowest. Now, because of the fall in prices beginning after the 1st of January a loss is sustained. What will happen in that case?

Mr. SIMMONS. He is simply permitted to re-form his inventory so as to make it reflect the change in the level of prices resulting from the shrinkage.

Mr. LENROOT. Why should not all that be taken care of in the year in which the loss actually occurred?

Mr. SMOOT. There was no loss. Say the inflation.

Mr. LENROOT. I speak of the current year.

Mr. SMOOT. It was the inflation in the prices given in the inventory. The case the Senator cites is a good one, and it ought to be carried clear through to the end.

Mr. LENROOT. I would be glad to have the Senator do that.

Mr. SMOOT. Take an institution whose inventory was taken, we will say, on the 31st day of December of this year, and the stock inventoried at $100,000. There was no loss sustained this year, because the actual value was determined. Now, he proceeds during the year 1919 with his business in its regular way, but on December 31, 1919, he takes an inventory of his stock again. He has on hand not the same identical goods but the same quantity of goods he had the year before. He finds the market value or the cost value of the goods, whichever is the lowest, inventories only $75,000. He has the same number of packages of goods, the same quantity of goods of every description. The inventory shows that there is a shrinkage in value to the amount of $25,000. Under (b) of this amendment he is allowed credit on whatever his taxes would be upon the loss of the $25,000 for the taxable year 1919. But the credit allowed is to be based upon the rate of taxation of 1918. Now, that is the meaning of the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it not a redetermination of the tax imposed for the previous year?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the previous year, and that is what I said. I think that case, if the Senator will look at it——

Mr. LENROOT. It will be 1918.

Mr. SMOOT. I am taking the invoices now of 1918 at the high peak. On the 31st of December, 1919, prices have shrunk $25,000. That shows that there was a loss sustained by the depreciation of the value of the goods of $25,000. Under this provision he is entitled to a credit of whatever the tax would be upon the $25,000 of loss which was sustained by the depreciation at the rate of taxation of 1918, because he has paid his tax upon the profits made upon that year's business with a value of merchandise of $100,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, allow me to make this statement to the Senator: Take the business of cattle raising. I happen to know one concern where some young men started in the business and allowed all their earnings to accumulate. Last year, about the close of the year, the prices of cattle were at their peak. They had kept books only by means of a check book and their bank account. The Government sent its expert there—perhaps they asked to have him sent—to make out their statement. Of course the matter of inventory came in. They inventoried those cattle at the market price. It was higher than was ever known before, and higher even than it is now.

In all probability as we go over into the next year there must naturally follow a very large reduction in price of stock cattle. It will be so much of a reduction probably that if we take everything that might be accumulated as profit next year it will show a net loss in the year 1919 owing to a shrinkage in prices. They were overtaxed the past year, so far as an average was concerned, and taxed at the very peak of the price.

I suppose the object of this legislation in a case like that would be to make good in some regard what was an overvaluation, as it proved, for the year before. The chairman of the committee will tell me whether that is the natural consequence of this legislation or not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I have not followed him.

Mr. LENROOT. I will agree that the case of a net loss would permit taking care of that kind of a situation, but I do contend that in a case where there is not a net loss there is no necessity or reason for carrying it back into the preceding taxable year, because it can be and would be, without this provision, fully taken care of in the current year.

Mr. WARREN. In the case I mentioned, if they make enough money the next year, notwithstanding shrinkages, so that they will be able to more than overcome the previous shrinkage and they still have some profit, I grant you that would be fair. On the other hand, if it should sweep away all the profits and a great deal more, I think the Senator will admit there should be some restitution.

Mr. LENROOT. I am not in anywise objecting to this provision, except I wanted to get the construction, and then I want to make this suggestion: The Government, it seems to me, under this theory may in 1920 lose a considerable sum of revenue.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think anyone is going to deny that that will be the result; and I want to say that as far as I understood the proposition and the amendment it was to relieve the taxpayers of the excessively high rates that are imposed upon the business of 1918. That is what it is for, and we might just as well admit that that is the reason for this amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator then concedes that it will relieve the taxpayer of the high rates imposed in 1918 for losses wholly sustained in 1919.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not want the Senator to go that far. It relieves the taxpayer as to the taxes of 1918, because of the fact that during the year the inflation in prices occurred, and his inventory shows during that year the inflation of the prices. That is when the actual loss was sustained, if any loss at all was sustained. It was when the stock that he had on hand was inventoried at the then market value that the foundation of the loss was sustained.

Mr. LENROOT. Although the decline did not begin until the following year.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, one further remark: The discussion proceeded yesterday and to-day along the line of commercial business, stocks of merchandise, and so forth. I wish for a moment to divert attention to the agricultural products, not only such as I have mentioned, cattle, but the same as to sheep, and as to both wool and mutton and somewhat also in the matter of grain. All of these are raised upon land, and the farmer has no control over the market. He does not buy and sell for profit, but simply tills the soil and sells his product for what he can get. As I understand, the Senator believes in covering all that.

Mr. LENROOT. I fully agree that in a case in the year 1919 there could be a net loss in the whole operation of business so that there could be no offset from the inventoried loss, and then it would be proper to go back to protect the taxpayer by permitting a reduction in 1918, but I do not see that it would be fair or proper in case there is income sufficient during the year 1919 or 1920 to take care of that loss so as to reduce his net income to go back to the preceding year.

Mr. President, may I ask if it is necessary to reserve the right to further bring up the amendment in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A separate vote can be demanded upon the amendment in the Senate. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 30, line 10, after the numeral "(9)," to strike out "and (10)" and insert "(10), and (12)"; on line 12, after the word "with," to strike out "a trade or business carried on" and insert "income arising from a source"; in line 15, after the words "with respect to," to strike out "trade or business within and without" and insert "sources of income within and without," so as to make the clause read:

(b) In the case of a nonresident alien individual the deductions allowed in paragraphs (1), (4), (7), (8), (9), (10), and (12) of subdivision (a) shall be allowed only if and to the extent that they are connected with income arising from a source within the United States; and the proper apportionment and allocation of the deductions with respect to sources of income within and without the United States shall be determined under rules and regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, under the heading "Items not deductible," in section 215, page 31, line 7, after the word "taxpayer," to strike out "or anyone financially interested in such trade or business," and in line 8, after the word "is," to insert "directly or indirectly," so as to make the section read:

ITEMS NOT DEDUCTIBLE.

SEC. 215. That in computing net income no deduction shall in any case be allowed in respect of—

(a) Personal, living, or family expenses;

(b) Any amount paid out for new buildings or for permanent improvements or betterments made to increase the value of any property or estate;

(c) Any amount expended in restoring property or in making good the exhaustion thereof for which an allowance is or has been made; or

(d) Premiums paid on any life insurance policy covering the life of any officer or employee or of any person financially interested in any trade or business carried on by the taxpayer when the taxpayer is directly or indirectly a beneficiary under such policy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, under the head of "Credits allowed," in section 216, on page 31, line 16, after the words "United States," to insert "and bonds issued by the War Finance Corporation," and in line 17, after the word "Corporation," to strike out "any State, Territory, any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia," so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 216. That for the purpose of the normal tax only there shall be allowed the following credits:

(a) The amount received as dividends from a corporation which is taxable under this title upon its net income.

(b) The amount received as interest upon obligations of the United States and bonds issued by the War Finance Corporation, which is included in gross income under section 213.

(c) In the case of a single person, a personal exemption of $1,000, or in the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife, a personal exemption of $2,000. A husband and wife living together shall receive but one personal exemption of $2,000 against their aggregate net income; and in case they make separate returns, the personal exemption of $2,000 may be taken by either or divided between them.

(d) Two hundred dollars for each person (other than husband or wife) dependent upon and receiving his chief support from the taxpayer, if such dependent person is under 18 years of age or is incapable of self-support because mentally or physically defective.

(e) In the case of a nonresident alien individual who is a citizen or subject of a country which imposes an income tax, the credits allowed in subdivisions (c) and (d) shall be allowed only if such country allows a similar credit to citizens of the United States not residing in such country.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 33, line 6, to strike from the heading the word "Partners" and insert "Partnerships and personal-service corporations," so as to make the heading head: "Partnerships and personal-service corporations"; and on page 34, after line 23, to insert:

(c) Personal-service corporations shall not be subject to taxation under this title, but the individual stockholders thereof shall be taxed in the same manner as the members of partnerships. All the provisions of this title relating to partnerships and the members thereof shall, so far as practicable, apply to personal-service corporations and the stockholders thereof: Provided, That in the case of any such corporation any amounts distributed during its taxable year shall be taxed to the distributees; and any portion of the net income remaining undistributed at the close of its taxable year shall for the purposes of this subdivision be assigned to the stockholders of such corporation at the close of its taxable year in proportion to their respective shares.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, under the head of "Estates and trusts," in section 219, page 35, line 24, after the word "regular," to strike out the word "interval" with a period and insert the words "intervals, and the income collected by a guardian of an infant to be held or distributed as the court may direct," so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 219. (a) That the tax imposed by sections 210 and 211 shall apply to the income of estates or of any kind of property held in trust, including—

(1) Income received by estates of deceased persons during the period of administration or settlement of the estate;

(2) Income accumulated in trust for the benefit of unborn or unascertained persons or persons with contingent interests;

(3) Income held for future distribution under the terms of the will or trust; and

(4) Income which is to be distributed to the beneficiaries, periodically, whether or not at regular intervals, and the income collected by a guardian of an infant to be held or distributed as the court may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 36, line 4, after the word "section," to strike out "212" and insert "212, except that there shall also be allowed as a deduction any part of the gross income which, pursuant to the terms of the will or deed creating the trust, is during the taxable year paid out or permanently set aside for exclusively religious, charitable, scientific, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals," so as to make the paragraph read:

(b) The fiduciary shall be responsible for making the return of income for the estate or trust for which he acts. The net income of the estate or trust shall be computed in the same manner and on the same basis as provided in section 212, except that there shall also be allowed as a deduction any part of the gross income which, pursuant to the terms of the will or deed creating the trust, is during the taxable year paid out or permanently set aside for exclusively religious, charitable, scientific, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or anima's; and in cases under paragraph (4) of subdivision (a) of this section the fiduciary shall include in the return a statement of each beneficiary's distributive share of such net income, whether or not distributed before the close of the taxable year for which the return is made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, in the heading, on page 37, line 14, to strike out the words "Undistributed profits subject to surtax," and insert "Profits of corporations taxable to stockholders."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, in section 220, page 37, line 16, after the word "That," to strike out "for the purpose of the surtax, the net income of any individual includes the share to which he would be entitled of the gains and profits, if divided or distributed, whether divided or distributed or not, of all corporations," and insert "if any corporation"; in line 20, before the word "formed," to insert "is"; in line 21, after the word "or," to strike out "fraudulently"; in line 22, after the words "imposition of," to strike out "such tax," and insert "the surtax upon its stockholders or members"; in line 23, after the word "permitting," to strike out "such," and insert "its"; in line 24, after the words "divided or," to strike out the word "distributed" and the semicolon, and insert "distributed, such corporation shall not be subject to the tax imposed by section 230 or by Title III, but the stockholders or members thereof shall be subject to taxation under this title in the same manner as provided in subdivision (e) of section 218 in the case of stockholders of a personal service corporation"; and, on page 38, line 5, after the word "corporation," to strike out "and the," so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 220. That if any corporation, however created or organized, is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its stockholders or members through the medium of permitting its gains and profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed, such corporation shall not be subject to the tax imposed by section 236 or by Title III, but the stockholders or members thereof shall be subject to taxation under this title in the same manner as provided in subdivision (e) of section 218 in the case of stockholders of a personal service corporation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 38, line 6, before the word "fact," to insert "The"; in the same line, after the word "any," to strike out "such"; in line 9, before the word "purpose," to strike out "fraudulent"; in the same line, after the word "escape," to strike out "such tax" and insert "the surtax"; in line 13, before the word "certifies," to strike out "Secretary" and insert "commissioner," so as to make the paragraph read:

Mr. SMOOT. As this same amendment referring to individuals was passed over at the request of the Senator from North Carolina, I think perhaps, as this has reference to corporations, it ought to go over, because the 1920 provision is, in this respect, just the same as the other.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that can go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I did not understand what was done with the amendment at the bottom of page 47.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was agreed to without objection.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to have that matter go over for the time being. I expect to submit some remarks upon it to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. Section 230?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Section 230.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator desires to submit some remarks upon that amendment and wants to move for its reconsideration, of course he can do that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. To save time, let it go over.

So as to read:

This credit shall be allowed only if the taxpayer furnishes evidence satisfactory to the commissioner showing the amount of income derived from sources within such foreign country or such possession of the United States, as the case may be, and all other information necessary for the computation of such credit.

The portion specified in clause (1) shall be subject to the rates prescribed by Title I of the revenue act of 1917 and by Title I of the revenue act of 1916 as amended by the revenue act of 1917; and the portion specified in clause (2) shall be subject to the rates prescribed by this title.

SEC. 239. That every corporation not exempt under subdivisions (1) to (13) of section 231 shall make a return, stating specifically the items of its gross income and the deductions and credits allowed by this title. The return shall be sworn to by the president, vice president, or other principal officer and by the treasurer or assistant treasurer. If any foreign corporation has no office or place of business in the United States, but has an agent in the United States, the return shall be made by the agent. In cases where receivers, trustees in bankruptcy, or assignees are operating the property or business of corporations, such receivers, trustees, or assignees shall make returns for such corporations in the same manner and form as corporations are required to make returns. Any tax due on the basis of such returns made by receivers, trustees, or assignees shall be collected in the same manner as if collected from the corporations of whose business or property they have custody and control.

Returns made under this section shall be subject to the provisions of sections 226 and 228.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 65, beginning with line 1, to insert:

CONSOLIDATED RETURNS.

SEC. 240. (a) That corporations which are affiliated within the meaning of this section shall, under regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, make a consolidated return of net income and invested capital for the purposes of this title and Title III, and the taxes thereunder shall be computed and determined upon the basis of such return.

In any case in which a tax is assessed upon the basis of a consolidated return, the total tax shall be computed in the first instance as a unit and shall then be assessed upon the respective affiliated corporations in such proportions as may be agreed upon among them, or, in the absence of any such agreement, then on the basis of the net income and invested capital properly assignable to each. There shall be allowed in computing the income tax only one specific credit of $2,000 (as provided in section 236); in computing the war-profits credit (as provided in section 311) only one specific exemption of $3,000; and in computing the excess-profits credit (as provided in section 312) only one specific exemption of $3,000.

(b) For the purpose of this section, two or more corporations shall be deemed to be affiliated—

(1) If one corporation owns directly or controls through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees substantially all the stock of the other or others, or if substantially all the stock of two or more corporations is owned or controlled by the same interests, or if one such corporation buys from or sells to another products or services at prices above or below the current market, thus effecting an artificial distribution of profits, or in any way so arranges its financial relationships with another corporation as to assign to it a disproportionate share of net income or invested capital.

(2) A foreign corporation shall not be deemed to be affiliated with a domestic corporation unless substantially all its stock is owned or controlled by such domestic corporation or by a resident taxpayer or group of resident taxpayers owning or controlling substantially all the stock of such domestic corporation. Where under this subdivision a foreign corporation is affiliated with a domestic corporation, the total tax (computed as a unit as above provided) shall be reduced by the credit authorized in section 238.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that subdivision (b) may go over. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] was compelled to leave the city on business and he will not be back until to-morrow or the next day. He has an amendment to offer to that paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask that the section shall go over, or the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Having been read, it will take no longer time, so that it all may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over temporarily.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 67, to insert lines 1 to 17, inclusive, as follows:

PART IV. LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES.

SEC. 245. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every life insurance company a tax as follows:

(a) In the case of a domestic life insurance company—

(1) For the calendar year 1918, 12 per cent of its net income;

(2) For each calendar year thereafter, 8 per cent of its net income.

(b) In the case of a foreign life insurance company—

(1) For the calendar year 1918, 12 per cent of the same proportion of the net income which the reserve fund upon business transacted within the United States is of the total reserve fund upon all business transacted, whether within or without the United States;

(2) For each calendar year hereafter, 8 per cent of such proportion of its net income.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, after line 17, on page 67, to insert to line 20, on page 68, as follows:

SEC. 246. (a) That in the case of a life insurance company the term "net income" means the gross income less—

(1) The amount of interest received during the taxable year which under paragraph (4) of subdivision (b) of section 213 is exempt from taxation under this title;

(2) An amount equal to the excess, if any, of 4 per cent of the mean of the reserve funds required by law and held during the taxable year over the amount specified in paragraph (1) of this subdivision;

(3) An amount equal to 2 per cent of any sums held at the end of the taxable year as a reserve for dividends (other than dividends payable during the year following the taxable year) the payment of which is deferred for a period of not less than five years from the date of the policy contract;

(4) Investment expenses paid during the taxable year not exceeding one-fourth of 1 per cent of the mean invested assets;

(5) Taxes and other expenses paid during the taxable year exclusively in connection with real estate owned by the company, not including taxes assessed against local benefits of a kind tending to increase the value of the property assessed and not including any amount paid out for new buildings or for permanent improvements or betterments made to increase the value of any property;

(6) In the case of a domestic life insurance company, $2,000.

(b) The net income shall be computed on the same basis as is provided in subdivision (b) of section 212 and in section 226.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 68, after line 20, to insert:

SEC. 247. That in the case of a life insurance company the term "gross income" means the gross amount of income received during the taxable year from interest, dividends, and rents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 69, line 1, in the heading, after the word "Part," to strike out "IV" and insert "V."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 69, to strike out the first paragraph of section 250 in the following words:

SEC. 250. That except as provided in sections 221 and 237 the tax shall be paid in installments, one-third of the amount of the tax shown in the return to be paid at the time fixed by law for filing the return, one-third on the 15th day of the second month thereafter, and the remaining one-third on the 15th day of the fourth month after the time fixed by law for filing the return; but where an extension of time for filing the return is granted, the first installment shall be due upon the expiration of the period of such extension, and the second and third installments shall be due as above stated, except that in the case of any taxpayer who is abroad the commissioner may extend the time for payment of the second and third installments not more than four months after the expiration of the period of any extension of time for filing his return. If any installment is not paid when due, the whole amount of the tax unpaid shall become due and payable upon notice and demand by the collector.

And to insert:

SEC. 250. (a) That except as otherwise provided in this section and sections 221 and 237 the tax shall be paid in four installments, each consisting of one-fourth of the total amount of the tax. The first installment shall be paid at the time fixed by law for filing the return, and the second installment shall be paid on the 15th day of the third month, the third installment on the 15th day of the sixth month, and the fourth installment on the 15th day of the ninth month, after the time fixed by law for filing the return. Where an extension of time for filing a return is granted the date of the expiration of the period of the extension shall be deemed to be the time fixed by law for filing the return. In any case in which the time for the payment of any installment is thus postponed because of an extension of time for filing the return, there shall be added as part of such installment interest thereon at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent per month from the time it would have been due if no extension had been granted, until paid. If any installment is not paid when due, the whole amount of the tax unpaid shall become due and payable upon notice and demand by the collector.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 73, after line 16, to insert:

(g) If the commissioner finds that a taxpayer designs quickly to depart from the United States or to remove his property therefrom, or to conceal himself or his property therein, or to do any other act tending to prejudice or to render wholly or partly ineffectual proceedings to collect the tax for the taxable year then last past or the taxable year then current unless such proceedings be brought without delay, the commissioner shall declare the taxable period for such taxpayer terminated at the end of the calendar month then last past and shall cause notice of such finding and declaration to be given the taxpayer, together with a demand for immediate payment of the tax for the taxable period so declared terminated and of the tax for the preceding taxable year or so much of said tax as is unpaid, whether or not the time otherwise allowed by law for filing return and paying the tax has expired; and such taxes shall thereupon become immediately due and payable. In any action or suit brought to enforce payment of taxes made due and payable by virtue of the provisions of this subdivision the finding of the commissioner, made as herein provided, whether made after notice to the taxpayer or not, shall be for all purposes presumptive evidence of the taxpayer's design. A taxpayer who is not in default in making any return or paying income, war profits, or excess-profits tax under any act of Congress may furnish to the United States, under regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, security approved by the commissioner that he will duly make the return next thereafter required to be filed and pay the tax next thereafter required to be paid. The commissioner may approve and accept in like manner security for return and payment of taxes made due and payable by virtue of the provisions of this subdivision, provided the taxpayer has paid in full all other income, war profits, or excess-profits taxes due from him under any act of Congress. If security is approved and accepted pursuant to the provisions of this subdivision and such further or other security with respect to the tax or taxes covered thereby is given as the commissioner shall from time to time find necessary and require, payment of such taxes shall not be enforced by any proceedings under the provisions of this subdivision prior to the expiration of the time otherwise allowed for paying such respective taxes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, under the subhead "Receipts for taxes," section 251, on page 75, line 10, after the word "shall," to insert the words "upon request," so as to read:

RECEIPT FOR TAXES.

SEC. 251. That every collector to whom any payment of any tax is made under the provisions of this title shall upon request give to the person making such payment a full written or printed receipt, stating the amount paid and the particular account for which such payment was made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, in the heading on page 83, line 10, after the words "Title III," to strike out "War profits and" and insert "War," so as to read: "Title III.—War excess-profits tax."

PART I. GENERAL DEFINITIONS.

SEC. 300. That when used in this title the terms "taxable year," "fiscal year," "personal service corporation," "paid or accrued," and "dividends" shall have the same meaning as provided for the purposes of income tax in sections 200 and 201. The first taxable year for the purposes of this title shall be the same as the first taxable year for the purposes of the income tax under Title II.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, under the heading "Part II.—Imposition of tax," in section 301, on page 83, after "Sec. 301," to insert "(a)"; in line 23, after the word "shall," to strike out "(except as otherwise provided in section 303)"; in line 24, after the word "for," to strike out "each" and insert "the"; in line 25, after the word "year," to insert "1918"; in the same line, after the word "every," to strike out the comma; and on page 84, line 1, after the word "tax," to strike out "computed according to whichever of the two following methods yields the higher amount of tax in the case of such corporation: (a) The war-profits method specified in Part III of this title, or (b) the excess-profits method specified in Part IV of this title," and insert "equal to the sum of the following," so as to make the clause read:

PART II. IMPOSITION OF TAX.

SEC. 301. (a) That in lieu of the tax imposed by Title II of the revenue act of 1917, but in addition to the other taxes imposed by this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for the taxable year 1918 upon the net income of every corporation a tax equal to the sum of the following.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask that that go over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the amendment will go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. What was the request of the Senator from Colorado, Mr. President?

Mr. THOMAS. I have asked that this Title III, in reference to war-excess profits, go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator's request extend to line 15, on page 85?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; I wish to offer a substitute for the title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. THOMAS. That will apply to the entire title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That action will be taken, unless there is objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Colorado to say that he was going to offer a substitute for this title.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before the substitute is offered is it not proper that we should perfect the text by the adoption of the amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection to any course of procedure——

Mr. SIMMONS. Therefore I think the regular course would be to agree or to disagree to the amendment reported by the committee and have the Senator from Colorado offer his substitute to the title as amended.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection to any procedure that will not estop me from offering a substitute to that title.

Mr. SIMMONS. Clearly the method that I suggest would not estop the Senator from offering his substitute, and it would be the proper procedure in order to lay the foundation for his substitute.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the part of the title referring to the year 1919 go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the title will be passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. It will all have to be passed over if the section referred to by the Senator from Utah is passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. It involves the same question as the other, and I think it ought to go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Chair correct in understanding that the Senator from Colorado has asked that the portion of the amendment down to line 24, on page 88, go over?

Mr. THOMAS. That was not my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understood the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. My request was to pass over the entire title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what point—including the part of the bill under the heading "Credits"?

Mr. THOMAS. The entire title. The subsequent title is "War and excess profits." I do not object to perfecting the title or the subject matter of the title if the Senator having charge of the bill so prefers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will first read the proposed amendments, and then the title, if amended, will be passed over as amended.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment which will cover the excess-profits provisions for the calendar year 1919 and subsequent years. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has reserved that provision on page 84. I am sure there are other provisions in the bill which affect that question.

Mr. SMOOT. I am positive that there are such provisions under this title, and I think the quickest way to accomplish the object desired would be to let the title go over.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I agree with that view of the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is not any necessity of the whole title going over because there is a 1920 provision in one of the amendments. The amendment in which that 1920 provision occurs ought to go over, but the remainder of it ought not to go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, of course, is unable to determine what portion of the bill should go over when Senators simply state the object of an amendment without referring to line or page.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, let us proceed with the reading of the bill, and when a 1920 provision injects itself in any way the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] can ask that the paragraph go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary, then, will resume the reading of the amendments on page 84, beginning in line 7, and continue the reading until an amendment to the amendment is offered or a reservation is made.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over was, on page 84, after line 6, to insert:

FIRST BRACKET.

Thirty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the excess-profits credit (determined under sec. 312) and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

SECOND BRACKET.

Sixty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

THIRD BRACKET.

The sum, if any, by which 80 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the war-profits credit (determined under sec. 311) exceeds the amount of the tax computed under the first and second brackets.

(b) For the taxable year 1919 and each taxable year thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the net income of every corporation a tax equal to the sum of the following:

FIRST BRACKET.

Twenty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the excess-profits credit (determined under sec. 312) and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

SECOND BRACKET.

Forty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

Mr. SMOOT. Let subdivision (b) go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Subdivision (b) will go over. The previous portion of the amendment will be agreed to, without objection. The Secretary will continue the reading of the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is further proposed to insert:

(c) in any case where the full amount of the excess-profits credit is not allowed under the first bracket of subdivision (a) or (b), by reason of the fact that such credit is in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital, the part not so allowed shall be deducted from the amount in the second bracket.

(d) For the purposes of the act approved March 21, 1918, entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," the tax imposed by this title shall be treated as levied by an act in amendment of Title II of the revenue act of 1917.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, in section 302, on page 85, line 16, after the word "That," to strike out "in the case of a corporation whose invested capital for the taxable year is not more than $25,000, the tax imposed by section 301 shall not be more than 35 per cent of the amount of its net income for such year in excess of $3,000; and if its invested capital for the taxable year is more than $25,000, but not more than $50,000, such tax shall not be more than 40 per cent of the amount of its net income for such year in excess of $3,000. This section shall not apply to any corporation whose net income is more than $50,000," and insert "the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section 301 shall in no case be more than 30 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $3,000 and not in excess of $20,000, plus 80 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $20,000; and the tax imposed by subdivision (b) of section 301 shall in no case be more than 20 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $3,000 and not in excess of $20,000, plus 40 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $20,000. Nothing in this section shall be construed in such manner as to increase the tax imposed by section 301."

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that section go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 86, after line 10, to strike out section 303, as follows:

SEC. 303. That in the case of a corporation the earnings of which are to be ascribed primarily to the activities of the principal owners or stockholders who are themselves regularly engaged in the active conduct of the affairs of the corporation, and in which capital (whether invested, borrowed, rented, or otherwise secured) is not directly or indirectly a material income-producing factor, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon its net income (in lieu of the tax imposed by Title II of the revenue act of 1917 and in lieu of the tax imposed by section 301 of this act, but in addition to the other taxes imposed by this act) a tax of 20 per cent of the amount of its net income in excess of $3,000. A foreign corporation shall not be entitled to the specific exemption of $3,000.

A corporation 50 per cent or more of whose gross income (as defined in section 213 for income-tax purposes) consists of gains or profits derived from purchase and sale, or of gains, profits, or commissions derived from Government contracts, or whose invested capital is more than $100,000 shall not be subject to the tax imposed by this section, but shall be subject to the tax imposed by section 301.

Wherever in this act reference is made to "war-profits" or "excess-profits" taxes, and the context shows that taxes imposed by act of Congress are referred to, such reference shall include the tax imposed by this section.

And to insert:

SEC. 305. That if part of the net income of a corporation is derived (1) from a trade or business (or a branch of a trade or business) in which the employment of capital is necessary and (2) a part (constituting not less than 30 per cent of its total net income) is derived from a separate trade or business (or a distinctly separate branch of the trade or business) which if constituting the sole trade or business would bring it within the class of "personal service corporations," then (under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary) the tax upon the first part of such net income shall be separately computed, and the tax upon the second part shall be the same percentage thereof as the tax so computed upon the first part is of such first part.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, in section 304, on page 88, line 5, after "(b)," to strike out "The taxes imposed by this title shall not be imposed in the case of a foreign corporation the net income of which during the taxable year is less than $3,000" and insert "Life insurance companies shall be exempt from taxation under this title."

The next amendment passed over was, on page 88, after line 11, to insert:

(d) In the case of any corporation engaged in the mining of gold, the portion of the net income derived from the mining of gold shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this title, and the tax on the remaining portion of the net income shall be computed upon the basis of an invested capital which bears the same ratio to the full invested capital as such remaining portion of the net income bears to the entire net income.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 88, line 24, in the subhead "Part III.—War-profits method," to strike out "War-profits method" and to insert "Credits," so as to read: "Part III.—Credits."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 89, after line 3, to strike out "section 311," in the following language:

SEC. 311. That the tax, if computed by the war-profits method, shall be 80 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the war-profits credit (determined under section 312).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 89, line 8, to change the number of the section from 312 (a) to 311 (a); and on page 89, line 13, after the word "the," to strike out "invested capital added or withdrawn since the close of the prewar period; but if" and insert "difference between the average invested capital for the prewar period and the invested capital for the taxable year if," so as to read:

(1) A specific exemption of $3,000; and
(2) An amount equal to the average net income of the corporation for the prewar period, plus or minus, as the case may be, 10 per cent of the difference between the average invested capital for the prewar period and the invested capital for the taxable year. If the tax is computed for a period of less than 12 months, such amount shall be reduced to the same proportion thereof as the number of months in the period is of 12 months.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 90, after line 3, to insert:

(c) If the corporation was not in existence during the whole of at least one calendar year during the prewar period, then the war-profits credit shall be the sum of:
(1) A specific exemption of $3,000; and
(2) An amount equal to the same percentage of the invested capital of the taxpayer for the taxable year as the average percentage of net income to invested capital, for the prewar period, of corporations engaged in a trade or business of the same general class as that conducted by the taxpayer; but such amount shall in no case be less than 10 per cent of the invested capital of the taxpayer for the taxable year. Such average percentage shall be determined by the commissioner on the basis of data contained in returns made under Title II of the revenue act of 1917, and the average known as the median shall be used. If such average percentage has not been determined and published at least 30 days prior to the time when the return of the taxpayer is due, then for purposes of such return 10 per cent shall be used in lieu thereof; but such average percentage when determined shall be used for the purposes of section 250 in determining the correct amount of the tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 91, at the beginning of line 1, to strike out subsection "(c)" and to insert "(d)."

50 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 15 per cent and not in excess of 20 per cent of such capital; and 70 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of such capital.

In any case where the full amount of the credit is not allowed under the first bracket above provided, by reason of the fact that such credit is in excess of 15 per cent of the invested capital, the part not so allowed shall be deducted from the amount in the next succeeding bracket, and if not then fully allowed the remaining part shall be deducted from the amount in the last bracket.

The invested capital for any period shall be the average invested capital for such period, but in the case of a corporation making a return for a fractional part of a year, it shall (except for the purpose of paragraph (2) of subdivision (a) of section 311) be the same fractional part of such average invested capital.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 98, line 5, after the words "Sec. 327," to strike out:

(a) That in the following cases the invested capital shall be determined as provided in subdivision (b) of this section: (1) Where the commissioner is unable satisfactorily to determine the invested capital as provided in section 326; or (2) where a mixed aggregate of tangible property and intangible property has been paid in for stock or for stocks and bonds and the commissioner is unable satisfactorily to determine the respective values of the several classes of property at the time of payment, or to distinguish the classes of property paid in for stock and for bonds, respectively; or (3) where capital is a material income-producing factor, but where, because of the fact that the capital employed is in large part borrowed, there is no invested capital or the invested capital is materially disproportionate to the net income as compared with representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business. This section shall not apply in the case of a corporation 50 per cent or more of whose gross income (as defined in section 213 for income-tax purposes) consists of gain, profits, or commissions derived from Government contracts, unless the commissioner is satisfied that such corporation is overcapitalized.

(b) In the cases specified in subdivision (a) the invested capital shall be the amount which bears the same ratio to the net income of the corporation for the taxable year as the average invested capital for the taxable year of representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business bears to their average net income for such year.

SEC. 328. (a) That in cases where invested capital is to be determined in the manner provided in section 327.

And to insert:

That in the following cases the tax shall be determined as provided in section 328:

(a) Where the commissioner is unable satisfactorily to determine the invested capital as provided in section 326;

(b) In the case of a foreign corporation;

(c) Where a mixed aggregate of tangible property and intangible property has been paid in for stock or for stock and bonds and the commissioner is unable satisfactorily to determine the respective values of the several classes of property at the time of payment, or to distinguish the classes of property paid in for stock and for bonds, respectively;

(d) Where, as compared with representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business, the taxpayer would (under section 326) be placed in a position of substantial inequality because of the time or manner of organization or because the actual value of the assets on March 1, 1913, was substantially in excess of the amount at which such assets would be valued for the purpose of computing invested capital under the provisions of section 326;

(e) Where the invested capital is materially disproportionate to the net income as compared with representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business because:

1. The capital employed, although a material income-producing factor, is very small or is in large part borrowed;

2. There are excluded from the invested capital as computed under the provisions of section 326 intangible assets of recognized and substantial value built up or developed by the taxpayer;

3. The net income for the taxable year is abnormally high, due to the realization in one year of (a) gains, profits, or income earned or accrued during a period of years or (b) extraordinary gains or profit derived from the sale of property the principal value of which has been demonstrated by prospecting or exploration and discovery work done by the taxpayer. When the tax is determined under this paragraph proper allowance shall be made for the taxes which would have been payable in prior years if the gains, profits, or income earned or accrued in such years had been taxed at the rates then applicable.

4. Proper recognition or allowance can not be made for amortization, obsolescence, or exceptional depletion due to the present war or to the necessity in connection with the present war of providing plant which will not be wanted for the purpose of the trade or business after the termination of the war.

SEC. 328. (a) In the cases specified in section 327 the tax shall be the amount which bears the same ratio to the net income of the taxpayer (in excess of the specific exemption of $3,000) for the taxable year as the average tax of representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business bears to their average net income (in excess of the specific exemption of $3,000) for such year. In such cases the commissioner shall compare the taxpayer only with representative corporations whose invested capital can be satisfactorily determined under section 326 and which are, as nearly as may be, similarly circumstanced with respect to gross income, net income, profits per unit of business transacted and capital employed, the amount and rate of war profits or excess profits, and all other relevant facts and circumstances.

The commissioner shall furnish a copy of such record and other detailed information with respect to such cases when required by resolution of either House of Congress, without regard to the restrictions contained in section 257.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, in section 330, page 102, line 23, after the word "by," to strike out "a corporation, the corporation" and insert "the taxpayer, the taxpayer"; in line 25, after the word "been," to strike out "in existence" and insert "engaged in such trade or business"; on page 103, line 3, after the words "prior to," to strike out "the organization of the corporation now carrying on such trade or business" and insert "such reorganization, consolidation, or change of ownership"; and in line 7, after the word "of," to strike out "such corporation" and insert "the taxpayer," so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 330. That in the case of the reorganization, consolidation, or change of ownership after January 1, 1911, of a trade or business now carried on by the taxpayer, the taxpayer shall, for the purposes of this title be deemed to have been engaged in such trade or business prior to that date, and the net income and invested capital of such predecessor trade or business for all or any part of the prewar period prior to such reorganization, consolidation, or change of ownership shall be deemed to have been the net income and invested capital of the taxpayer.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment to be inserted after the word "taxpayer."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 103, line 7, after the word "taxpayer," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to conflict with the provisions of section 326.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee, the reason for that amendment is this: This section provides as to what shall be done with reorganized companies and goes to the question as to what shall be considered invested capital. The section reads:

SEC. 330. That in the case of the reorganization, consolidation, or change of ownership after January 1, 1911, of a trade or business now carried on by the taxpayer, the taxpayer shall for the purposes of this title be deemed to have been engaged in such trade or business prior to that date, and the net income and invested capital of such predecessor trade or business for all or any part of the prewar period prior to such reorganization, consolidation, or change of ownership shall be deemed to have been the net income and invested capital of the taxpayer.

In section 326 "invested capital" is defined and includes cash. When the two sections are construed together I do not think that there can be very much difficulty about the construction, but a question has been raised by some of my constituents, and, if I may give the example which was presented to me, it is this: A certain corporation, with assets aggregating about $300,000, was sold out to a reorganized corporation for $200,000. They added to its capital approximately $800,000 of new capital. Under this section, as it now reads, it would seem as if the invested capital would be the same as that of the original company. I wish to make it perfectly clear that the invested capital shall be as defined in section 330 plus any newly invested capital that may be put into it. In other words, the amendment simply goes to the clarity of the provision; it in no sense, I think, changes the thought that the committee had in mind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will take the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 103, beginning with line 8, to strike out:

If such predecessor trade or business was carried on by a partnership or individual the net income for the prewar period shall be ascertained and returned upon the same basis and in the same manner as provided for income-tax purposes in Title II, except that the credits provided in subdivisions (a) and (b) of section 216 shall be deducted.

And to insert:

If such predecessor trade or business was carried on by a partnership or individual the net income for the prewar period shall, under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, be ascertained and returned as nearly as may be upon the same basis and in the same manner as provided for corporations in Title II, including a reasonable deduction for salary or compensation to each partner or the individual for personal services actually rendered.

If any asset of the trade or business in existence both during the taxable year and any prewar year is included in the invested capital for the taxable year, but is not included in the invested capital for such prewar year, or is valued on a different basis in computing the invested capital for the taxable year and such prewar year, respectively, then under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, such readjustments shall be made as are necessary to place the computation of the invested capital for such prewar year on the basis employed in determining the invested capital for the taxable year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, in section 331, page 104, line 9, after the word "business," to insert a comma and the words "or change of ownership of property"; in line 11, after the word "business," to insert "or property"; in line 13, after the word "the," to strike out "predecessor trade or business" and insert "previous owner"; in line 17, after the word "such," to strike out "prior trade or business" and insert "previous owner"; and in line 19, after the word "received," to insert: "Provided, That if such previous owner was not a corporation, then the value of any asset so transferred or received shall be taken at its cost of acquisition (at the date when acquired by such previous owner) with proper allowance for depreciation, impairment, betterment, or development, but no addition to the original cost shall be made for any charge or expenditure deducted as expense or otherwise since March 1, 1913, in computing the net income of such previous owner for purposes of taxation," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 331. In the case of the reorganization, consolidation, or change of ownership of a trade or business, or change of ownership of property, after March 3, 1917, if an interest or control in such trade or business or property of 50 per cent or more remains in the same persons, or any of them, then no asset transferred or received from the previous owner shall, for the purpose of determining invested capital, be allowed a greater value than would have been allowed under this title in computing the invested capital of such previous owner if such asset had not been so transferred or received: Provided, That if such previous owner was not a corporation, then the value of any asset so transferred or received shall be taken at its cost of acquisition (at the date when acquired by such previous owner) with proper allowance for depreciation, impairment, betterment, or development, but no addition to the original cost shall be made for any charge or expenditure deducted as expense or otherwise since March 1, 1918, in computing the net income of such previous owner for purposes of taxation.

21 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $2,000,000 and does not exceed $3,000,000;

24 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $3,000,000 and does not exceed $4,000,000;

27 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $4,000,000 and does not exceed $5,000,000;

30 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $5,000,000 and does not exceed $8,000,000;

35 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $8,000,000 and does not exceed $10,000,000; and 40 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $10,000,000.

SEC. 402. That the value of the gross estate of the decedent shall be determined by including the value at the time of his death of all property, real or personal, tangible or intangible, wherever situated—

(a) To the extent of the interest therein of the decedent at the time of his death which after his death is subject to the payment of the charges against his estate and the expenses of its administration and is subject to distribution as part of his estate;

(b) To the extent of any interest therein of the surviving spouse, existing at the time of the decedent's death as dower, curtesy, or by virtue of a statute creating an estate in lieu of dower or curtesy;

(c) To the extent of any interest therein of which the decedent has at any time made a transfer, or with respect to which he has at any time created a trust, in contemplation of or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after his death (whether such transfer or trust is made or created before or after the passage of this act), except in case of a bona fide sale for a fair consideration in money or money's worth. Any transfer of a material part of his property in the nature of a final disposition or distribution thereof, made by the decedent within three years prior to his death without such a consideration, shall, unless shown to the contrary, be deemed to have been made in contemplation of death within the meaning of this title;

(d) To the extent of the interest therein held jointly or as tenants in the entirety by the decedent and any other person, or deposited in banks or other institutions in their joint names and payable to either or the survivor, except such part thereof as may be shown to have originally belonged to such other person and never to have belonged to the decedent;

(e) To the extent of any property passing under a general power of appointment exercised by the decedent (1) by will, or (2) by deed executed in contemplation of, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after his death, except in case of a bona fide sale for a fair consideration in money or money's worth; and

(f) To the extent of the amount receivable by the executor as insurance under policies taken out by the decedent upon his own life; and to the extent of the excess over $40,000 of the amount receivable by all other beneficiaries as insurance under policies taken out by the decedent upon his own life.

SEC. 403. That for the purpose of the tax the value of the net estate shall be determined—

(a) In the case of a resident, by deducting from the value of the gross estate—

(1) Such amounts for funeral expenses, administration expenses, claims against the estate, unpaid mortgages, losses incurred during the settlement of the estate arising from fires, storms, shipwreck, or other casualty, or from theft, when such losses are not compensated for by insurance or otherwise, and such amounts reasonably required and actually expended for the support during the settlement of the estate of those dependent upon the decedent, as are allowed by the laws of the jurisdiction, whether within or without the United States, under which the estate is being administered, but not including any income taxes upon income received after the death of the decedent, or any estate, succession, legacy, or inheritance taxes;

(2) An amount equal to the value at the time of the decedent's death of any property—real, personal, or mixed—which can be identified as having been received by the decedent as a share in the estate of any person who died within five years prior to the death of the decedent, or which can be identified as having been acquired by the decedent in exchange for property so received, if an estate tax under the revenue act of 1917 or under this act was collected from such estate, and if such property is included in the decedent's gross estate; and

(3) An exemption of $50,000;

(b) In the case of a nonresident, by deducting from the value of that part of his gross estate which at the time of his death is situated in the United States—

(1) That proportion of the deductions specified in paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of this section which the value of such part bears to the value of his entire gross estate, wherever situated, but in no case shall the amount so deducted exceed 10 per cent of the value of that part of his gross estate which at the time of his death is situated in the United States; and

(2) An amount equal to the value at the time of the decedent's death of any property—real, personal, or mixed—which can be identified as having been received by the decedent as a share in the estate of any person who died within five years prior to the death of the decedent, or which can be identified as having been acquired by the decedent in exchange for property so received, if any estate tax under the revenue act of 1917 or under this act was collected from such estate, and if such property is included in that part of the decedent's gross estate which at the time of his death is situated in the United States.

No deductions shall be allowed in the case of a nonresident unless the executor includes in the return required to be filed under section 404 the value at the time of his death of that part of the gross estate of the nonresident not situated in the United States.

For the purpose of this title, stock in a domestic corporation owned and held by a nonresident decedent, and the amount receivable as insurance upon the life of a nonresident decedent where the insurer is a domestic corporation, shall be deemed property within the United States, and any property of which the decedent has made a transfer or with respect to which he has created a trust, within the meaning of subdivision (c) of section 402, shall be deemed to be situated in the United States, if so situated either at the time of the transfer or the creation of the trust, or at the time of the decedent's death.

SEC. 404. That the executor, within 60 days after qualifying as such, or after coming into possession of any property of the decedent, whichever event first occurs, shall give written notice thereof to the collector. The executor shall also, at such times and in such manner as may be required by regulations made pursuant to law, file with the collector a return under oath in duplicate, setting forth (a) the value of the gross estate of the decedent at the time of his death, or, in case of a nonresident, of that part of his gross estate situated in the United States; (b) the deductions allowed under section 403; (c) the value of the net estate of the decedent as defined in section 403; and (d) the tax paid or payable thereon; or such part of such information as may at the time be ascertainable and such supplemental data as may be necessary to establish the correct tax.

Return shall be made in all cases where the gross estate at the death of the decedent exceeds $50,000, and in the case of the estate of every nonresident any part of whose gross estate is situated in the United States. If the executor is unable to make a complete return as to any part of the gross estate of the decedent, he shall include in his return a description of such part and the name of every person holding a legal or beneficial interest therein, and upon notice from the collector such person shall in like manner make a return as to such part of the gross estate. The commissioner shall make all assessments of the tax under the authority of existing administrative special and general provisions of law relating to the assessment and collection of taxes.

SEC. 405. That if no administration is granted upon the estate of a decedent, or if no return is filed as provided in section 404, or if a return contains a false or incorrect statement of a material fact, the collector or deputy collector shall make a return and the commissioner shall assess the tax thereon.

SEC. 406. That the tax shall be due one year after the decedent's death, but in any case where the commissioner finds that payment of the tax within one year after the decedent's death would impose undue hardship upon the estate, he may grant an extension of time for the payment of the tax for a period not to exceed two years from the due date. If the tax is not paid within 1 year and 180 days after the decedent's death, interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the expiration of one year after the decedent's death shall be added as part of the tax.

SEC. 407. That the executor shall pay the tax to the collector or deputy collector. If the amount of the tax can not be determined, the payment of a sum of money sufficient, in the opinion of the collector, to discharge the tax shall be deemed payment in full of the tax, except as in this section otherwise provided. If the amount so paid exceeds the amount of the tax as finally determined, the commissioner shall refund such excess to the executor. If the amount of the tax as finally determined exceeds the amount so paid, the collector shall notify the executor of the amount of such excess and demand payment thereof. If such excess part of the tax is not paid within 10 days after such notification, interest shall be added thereto at the rate of 10 per cent per annum from the expiration of such 10 days' period until paid, and the amount of such excess shall be a lien upon the entire gross estate, except such part thereof as may have been sold to a bona fide purchaser for a fair consideration in money or money's worth.

The collector shall grant to the person paying the tax duplicate receipts, either of which shall be sufficient evidence of such payment, and shall entitle the executor to be credited and allowed the amount thereof by any court having jurisdiction to audit or settle his accounts.

SEC. 408. That if the tax herein imposed is not paid within 180 days after it is due, the collector shall, unless there is reasonable cause for further delay, proceed to collect the tax under the provisions of general law, or commence appropriate proceedings in any court of the United States, in the name of the United States, to subject the property of the decedent to be sold under the judgment or decree of the court. From the proceeds of such sale the amount of the tax, together with the costs and expenses of every description to be allowed by the court, shall be first paid, and the balance shall be deposited according to the order of the court, to be paid under its direction to the person entitled thereto.

If the tax or any part thereof is paid by, or collected out of that part of the estate passing to or in the possession of, any person other than the executor in his capacity as such, such person shall be entitled to reimbursement out of any part of the estate still undistributed or by a just and equitable contribution by the persons whose interest in the estate of the decedent would have been reduced if the tax had been paid before the distribution of the estate or whose interest is subject to equal or prior liability for the payment of taxes, debts, or other charges against the estate, it being the purpose and intent of this title that so far as is practicable and unless otherwise directed by the will of the decedent the tax shall be paid out of the estate before its distribution. If any part of the gross estate consists of proceeds of policies of insurance upon the life of the decedent receivable by a beneficiary other than the executor, the executor shall be entitled to recover from such beneficiary such portion of the total tax paid as the proceeds, in excess of $40,000, of such policies bear to the net estate. If there is more than one such beneficiary, the executor shall be entitled to recover from such beneficiaries in the same ratio.

SEC. 409. That unless the tax is sooner paid in full, it shall be a lien for 10 years upon the gross estate of the decedent, except that such part of the gross estate as is used for the payment of charges against the estate and expenses of its administration, allowed by any court having jurisdiction thereof, shall be divested of such lien. If the commissioner is satisfied that the tax liability of an estate has been fully discharged, he may, under regulations prescribed by him with the approval of the Secretary, issue his certificate releasing any or all property of such estate from the lien herein imposed.

If (a) the decedent makes a transfer of, or creates a trust with respect to, any property in contemplation of or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after his death (except in the case of a bona fide sale for a fair consideration in money or money's worth) or (b) if insurance passes under a contract executed by the decedent in favor of a specific beneficiary, and if in either case the tax in respect thereto is not paid when due, then the transferee, trustee, or beneficiary shall be personally liable for such tax, and such property, to the extent of the decedent's interest therein at the time of such transfer, or to the extent of such beneficiary's interest under such contract of insurance, shall be subject to a like lien equal to the amount of such tax. Any part of such property sold by such transferee or trustee to a bona fide purchaser for a fair consideration in money or money's worth shall be divested of the lien and a like lien shall then attach to all the property of such transferee or trustees, except any part sold to a bona fide purchaser for a fair consideration in money or money's worth.

SEC. 410. That whoever knowingly makes any false statement in any notice or return required to be filed under this title shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding $5,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Whoever fails to comply with any duty imposed upon him by section 404, or, having in his possession or control any record, file, or paper, containing or supposed to contain any information concerning the estate of the decedent, or, having in his possession or control any property comprised in the gross estate of the decedent, fails to exhibit the same upon request to the commission or any collector or law officer of the United States, or his duly authorized deputy or agent, who desires to examine the same in the performance of his duties under this title, shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding $500, to be recovered, with costs of suit, in a civil action in the name of the United States.

And to insert:

TITLE IV. INHERITANCE TAX.

SEC. 400. That when used in this title—

The term "executor" means the executor or administrator of the decedent, or, if there is no executor or administrator, any person who takes possession of any property of the decedent; and

The term "collector" means the collector of internal revenue of the district in which was the domicile of the decedent at the time of his death, or, if there was no such domicile in the United States, then the collector of the district in which is situated the part of the gross estate of the decedent in the United States, or, if such part of the gross estate is situated in more than one district, then the collector of internal revenue of such district as may be designated by the commissioner.

SEC. 401. That (in lieu of the tax imposed by Title II of the revenue act of 1916, as amended, and in lieu of the tax imposed by Title IX of the revenue act of 1917) a tax is hereby imposed upon the transfer by reason of the death of a resident of the United States, dying after the passage of this act, of any tangible or intangible property wherever situated, or any interest therein or income therefrom, or by reason of the death of a nonresident of the United States, dying after the passage of this act, of any tangible or intangible property within the United States, or any interest therein or income therefrom, to any person in trust or otherwise, equal to the sum of the following percentages of the total value of the beneficial interests transferred to such person in any manner by reason of the death of the decedent:

One per cent of the amount by which the beneficial interests passing to such person exceed $10,000 and do not exceed $25,000;

2 per cent of the amount by which such beneficial interests exceed $25,000 and do not exceed $50,000;

3 per cent of the amount by which such beneficial interests exceed $50,000 and do not exceed $100,000;

4 per cent of the amount by which such beneficial interests exceed $100,000 and do not exceed $150,000;

5 per cent of the amount by which such beneficial interests exceed $150,000 and do not exceed $200,000;
6 per cent of the amount by which such beneficial interests exceed $200,000 and do not exceed $250,000;
10 per cent of the amount by which such beneficial interests exceed $250,000 and do not exceed $500,000;
15 per cent of the amount by which such beneficial interests exceed $500,000 and do not exceed $1,000,000;
20 per cent of the amount by which such beneficial interests exceed $1,000,000 and do not exceed $2,500,000;
25 per cent of the amount by which such beneficial interests exceed $2,500,000.

Transfers by reason of the death of a decedent dying during the continuance of the present war while serving in the military or naval forces of the United States or dying within one year after the termination of such war from injuries received or disease contracted in such service shall not be taxable hereunder.

Transfers to or for the use of the United States, a State, or any political division thereof, for public purposes exclusively, transfers to or for the use of any corporation organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational purposes, including the encouragement of art and the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, and transfers to a trustee or trustees exclusively for such religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational purposes, shall not be taxable hereunder.

SEC. 402. That the following shall be deemed to be taxable transfers under the provisions of this title:

(a) Transfers by the laws of intestate succession or by will, including the creation by will of powers of appointment and the exercise by will of general powers of appointment;

(b) Transfers by deed, grant, or gift, including the exercise by deed of general powers of appointment, made in contemplation of the death of the vendor, grantor, or donor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death, except in the case of a bona fide sale for a fair consideration in money or money's worth, whether such deed, grant, or gift was made before or after the passage of this act. Any transfer of a material part of his property in the nature of a final disposition or distribution thereof, made by the decedent within two years prior to his death without such a consideration, shall, unless shown to the contrary, be deemed to have been made in contemplation of death within the meaning of this title; and

(c) Other transfers by reason of the death of the decedent, to wit: (1) The consummation in a surviving spouse of dower or curtesy or statutory rights in lieu thereof; (2) the accrual to a surviving tenant or depositor through survivorship of complete title to property held jointly or as tenants by the entirety by the decedent and any other person, or deposited in banks or other institutions in their joint names and payable to either or the survivor, except such part thereof as may be shown to have originally belonged to such other person and never to have belonged to the decedent; and (3) the receipt by a beneficiary of an amount of insurance in excess of $25,000 under policies taken out by the decedent upon his own life.

SEC. 403. That taxes upon transfers shall be computed upon the total value of all the beneficial interests transferred to the same person in any manner by reason of the death of a decedent. Whenever at the time a tax becomes due the persons to whom beneficial interests are transferred by reason of the death of a decedent are not in being or can not be ascertained, or the extent of the beneficial interests transferred can not be ascertained, for the reason that the transfers are conditioned upon the happening of a contingency or of the exercise of a discretion or a power of appointment, all the property so transferred shall for the purpose of the computation and collection of the tax be deemed to be transferred to the estate of said decedent, and as to such transfers such estate shall be treated under the provisions of this title as a person, and, except in the case of the exercise of a general power of appointment, no further tax under this title shall be collected on transfers of such beneficial interests at the time the persons to whom they are transferred or the extent of the interests transferred to such persons are ascertained.

SEC. 404. That the value of the beneficial interests, transfers of which are taxable under this title, shall be determined as follows:

(a) The total value of the beneficial interests transferred to any transferee shall be the value of that part of the property included within the net estate of the decedent (determined as provided in sec. 406) which passes to such transferee by any of the methods of transfer described in section 402: Provided, however, That whenever a beneficial interest transferred to any person by reason of the death of a nonresident decedent is not an interest in specific property, the value of the beneficial interest the transfer of which is subject to taxation under this title shall be such proportion of the value of the total beneficial interest so transferred as the value of that part of the gross estate which at the time of the death of the decedent is situated in the United States bears to the value of his entire gross estate wherever situated. If an executor does not include in the return required to be filed under section 407 the value at the time of the death of the nonresident decedent of that part of his gross estate not situated in the United States, the amount of the net estate shall be apportioned among the transferees of the beneficial interests in the manner which will result in the greatest possible amount of tax upon the transfer of such net estate.

(b) In the case of resident and nonresident decedents the following rules of valuation shall apply: (1) The value of an annuity, life estate, term of years, or other interest terminating on the expiration of a certain period shall be determined by the American Experience Tables of Mortality at per cent compound interest or by such other tables of mortality at such rate of interest as may be prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary; (2) the value of a remainder in any property after an annuity, life estate, term of years, or other interest terminating on the expiration of a certain period shall be ascertained by deducting the value of such annuity, life estate, term of years, or other interest terminating on the expiration of a certain period from the value of such property; (3) there shall not be included in the value of a beneficial interest the value at the time of the decedent's death of any property which can be identified as having been received by the decedent as a share in the estate of any person who died within five years prior to the death of the decedent, or which can be identified as having been acquired by the decedent in exchange for property so received, if an estate tax under the revenue act of 1917 was collected from such estate or an inheritance tax under this act was collected on the transfer of such property; and (4) there shall not be included in the value of a beneficial interest any amounts paid or required to be paid therefrom as estate, succession, legacy, or inheritance taxes imposed by any authority other than that of the United States.

SEC. 405. That the value of the gross estate of the decedent shall be determined by including the value at the time of his death of all property, real or personal, tangible or intangible, wherever situated—

(a) To the extent of the interest therein of the decedent at the time of his death which after his death is subject to the payment of the charges against his estate and the expenses of its administration and is subject to distribution as part of his estate;

(b) To the extent of any interest therein of which the decedent has at any time made a transfer in contemplation of or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after his death (whether such transfer is made before or after the passage of this act), except in case of a bona fide sale for a fair consideration in money or money's worth;

(c) To the extent of any interest therein of the surviving spouse, existing at the time of the decedent's death as dower, curtesy, or by virtue of a statute creating an estate in lieu of dower or curtesy;

(d) To the extent of the interest therein held jointly or as tenants by the entirety by the decedent and any other person, or deposited in banks or other institutions in their joint names and payable to either or the survivor, except such part thereof as may be shown to have originally belonged to such other person and never to have belonged to the decedent;

(e) To the extent of any property passing under a general power of appointment exercised by the decedent (1) by will, or (2) by deed executed in contemplation of, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after, his death, except in case of a bona fide sale for a fair consideration in money or money's worth; and

(f) To the extent of the amount receivable by the executor as insurance under policies taken out by the decedent upon his own life; and to the extent of the excess over $25,000 of the amount receivable by any beneficiary as insurance under policies taken out by the decedent upon his own life.

SEC. 406. That the value of the net estate shall be determined—

(a) In the case of a resident decedent, by deducting from the value of the gross estate—

Such amounts for funeral expenses, administration expenses, claims against the estate, unpaid mortgages, losses incurred during the settlement of the estate arising from fires, storms, shipwreck, or other casualty, or from theft, when such losses are not compensated for by insurance or otherwise, and such amounts reasonably required and actually expended for the support during the settlement of the estate of those dependent upon the decedent, as are allowed by the laws of the jurisdiction, whether within or without the United States, under which the estate is being administered, but not including any income taxes upon incomes received after the death of the decedent or any inheritance taxes imposed by this title. If a decedent gives, bequeaths, or devises to his executor any property in lieu of compensation the value thereof in excess of reasonable compensation shall not be deducted from the value of the gross estate.

(b) In the case of a nonresident decedent, by deducting from the value of that part of his gross estate which at the time of his death is situated in the United States—

That proportion of the deductions specified in subdivision (a) of this section which the value of such part bears to the value of his entire gross estate, wherever situated, but in no case shall the amount so deducted exceed 10 per cent of the value of that part of his gross estate which at the time of his death is situated in the United States.

No deduction shall be allowed in the case of a nonresident decedent unless the executor includes in the return required to be filed under section 407 the value at the time of his death of that part of the gross estate of the nonresident decedent not situated in the United States.

For the purpose of this title stock in a domestic corporation owned and held by a nonresident decedent, and the amount receivable as insurance upon the life of a nonresident decedent where the insurer is a domestic corporation, shall be deemed property within the United States, and any property of which the decedent has made a transfer within the meaning of subdivision (c) of section 405 shall be deemed to be situated in the United States, if so situated either at the time of the transfer or at the time of the decedent's death.

SEC. 407. That the executor, within 60 days after qualifying as such, or after coming into possession of any property of the decedent, whichever event first occurs, shall give written notice thereof to the collector. The executor shall also, at such time and in such manner as may be required by regulations made pursuant to law, file with the collector a return under oath in duplicate, setting forth (a) the value of the gross estate of the decedent at the time of his death, or, in case of a nonresident, of that part of his gross estate situated in the United States; (b) the deductions allowed under section 406; (c) the value of the net estate of the decedent as defined in section 406; (d) the names of the persons to whom beneficial interests are transferred in any manner by reason of the death of the decedent and descriptions of the beneficial interests so transferred; and (e) the tax paid or payable thereon; or such part of such information as may at the time be ascertainable and such supplemental data as may be necessary to establish the correct tax.

Return shall be made in all cases where the gross estate at the death of the decedent exceeds $10,000 and in the case of the estate of every nonresident any part of whose gross estate is situated in the United States. If the executor is unable to make a complete return as to any part of the gross estate of the decedent, he shall include in his return a description of such part and the name of every person holding a legal or beneficial interest therein, and upon notice from the collector such person shall in like manner make a return as to such part of the gross estate. The commissioner shall make all assessments of the tax under the authority of existing administrative special and general provisions of law relating to the assessment and collection of taxes.

SEC. 408. That if no administration is granted upon the estate of a decedent, or if no return is filed as provided in section 407, or if a return contains a false or incorrect statement of a material fact, the collector or deputy collector shall make a return and the commissioner shall assess the tax thereon.

SEC. 409. That the tax shall be due one year after the decedent's death; but in any case where the commissioner finds that payment of the tax within one year after the decedent's death would impose undue hardship upon the estate, he may grant an extension of time for the payment of the tax for a period not to exceed three years from the due date. If the tax is not paid within one year and 180 days after the decedent's death, interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the expiration of one year after the decedent's death shall be added as part of the tax.

SEC. 410. That the executor shall pay the tax to the collector. If the amount of the tax can not be determined, the payment of a sum of money sufficient, in the opinion of the collector, to discharge the tax shall be deemed payment in full of the tax, except as in this section otherwise provided. If the amount so paid exceeds the amount of the tax as finally determined, the commissioner shall refund such excess to the executor. If the amount of the tax as finally determined exceeds the amount so paid, the collector shall notify the executor of the amount of such excess and demand payment thereof. If such excess part of the tax is not paid within 30 days after such notification, interest shall be added thereto at the rate of 10 per cent per annum from the expiration of such 30 days' period until paid.

The collector shall grant to the person paying the tax duplicate receipts, either of which shall be sufficient evidence of such payment, and shall entitle the executor to be credited and allowed the amount thereof by any court having jurisdiction to audit or settle his accounts.

SEC. 411. That if the tax herein imposed is not paid within 180 days after it is due, the collector shall, unless there is reasonable cause for further delay, proceed to collect the tax under the provisions of general law, or commence appropriate proceedings in any court of the United States, in the name of the United States, to subject the property of the decedent to be sold under the judgment or decree of the court. From the proceeds of such sale the amount of the tax, together with the costs and expenses of every description to be allowed by the court, shall be first paid, and the balance shall be deposited according to the order of the court, to be paid under its direction to the person entitled thereto.

SEC. 412. That each person shall be liable to the executor for the tax upon transfers to such person and the executor shall collect from such person the tax upon all transfers to such person, or shall deduct it from any property in his possession or control transferred to such person. The executor shall not pay or deliver any property the transfer of which is subject to tax to any transferee unless the tax upon such transfer has been so collected or deducted. Whenever there is a transfer of property taxable under this title of which the executor has no possession or control, the person having possession or control thereof, or under liability to make any payment to the transferee, shall be liable to the executor for the tax upon such transfer and unless the tax has been paid by the transferee to the executor shall collect or deduct it from such property or such payment and pay it to the executor: Provided, however, That the commissioner may, with the approval of the Secretary, by regulations authorize the payment of such tax directly to the collector and relieve the executor from liability therefor: Provided further, That in the case of policies of insurance upon the life of the decedent payable to a beneficiary other than the executor of the estate of the decedent, the corporation liable for the payment thereof shall be relieved from liability for any tax thereon if such beneficiary submits with the proofs of death and claims a written statement showing that the aggregate amount of insurance payable to such beneficiary under policies taken out by the decedent upon his own life does not exceed $25,000. All taxes, including taxes on the transfer of annuities, life estates, terms for years, and other interests terminating on the expiration of a certain period, shall be paid out of and chargeable to capital and not to income. Nothing in this title shall prevent an executor from paying taxes out of such property as the will or other instrument under which transfer is made shall direct, but such directions shall not affect any right of the United States or of the collector to collect the tax or to a lien therefor.

If the amount of tax paid or collected out of property transferred to any person exceeds the amount of tax of which such person is liable, such person shall be entitled to reimbursement to the extent of such excess out of any part of the estate still undistributed, or to a just and equitable contribution by the persons liable for the tax so paid or collected under this title.

SEC. 413. That the tax and interest thereon shall be a lien upon the property included in the gross estate of the decedent and the property acquired in substitution therefor from the death of the decedent for a period of 10 years unless it is sooner paid in full, except that such property as is used for the payment of charges against the estate and expenses of its administration allowed by any court having jurisdiction thereof, and such personal property as is sold to purchasers for value in good faith and without notice of the lien shall be divested of such lien. If the commissioner is satisfied that the tax liability on all transfers by reason of the death of a decedent has been fully discharged or provided for, he may, under regulations prescribed by him, with the approval of the Secretary, issue his certificate releasing any or all property of such decedent from the lien hereby imposed, or if he is satisfied that the tax liability on all transfers to any person by reason of the death of a decedent has been fully discharged, he may, under such regulations, issue his certificate releasing any or all property transferred to such person from the lien hereby imposed.

SEC. 414. That whoever knowingly makes any false statement in any notice or return required to be filed under this title shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding $5,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Whoever fails to comply with any duty imposed upon him by section 407, or having in his possession or control any record, file, or paper containing or supposed to contain any information concerning the estate of the decedent, or, having in his possession or control any property comprised in the gross estate of the decedent, fails to exhibit the same upon request of the commissioner or any collector or law officer of the United States, or his duly authorized deputy or agent, who desires to examine the same in the performance of his duties under this title, shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding $5,000, in lieu of all other penalties, to be recovered, with costs of suit, in a civil action in the name of the United States.

SEC. 415. That the taxes imposed by Title II of the revenue act of 1916 as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1917, and by Title IX of the revenue act of 1917, shall not apply to the transfer of the net estate of any decedent dying before the passage of this act while serving in the military or naval forces of the United States in the present war or from injuries received or disease contracted while in such service, and any such tax collected upon such transfer shall be refunded to the executor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to an amendment which I am quite sure will be agreeable to him and to the committee. It is a perfecting amendment. At the end of section 407, on page 131, line 9, after the word "taxes," I move to insert the following:

Each beneficiary of an amount of insurance in excess of $25,000 under policies taken out by the decedent upon his own life shall within 20 days after coming into possession of such insurance give written notice thereof to the collector, and shall also at such time and in such manner as may be required by regulations made pursuant to law file with the collector a return under oath setting forth (a) the total insurance received, (b) such additional data as may be necessary to establish the correct tax, and (c) the tax paid or payable thereon. At the same time or upon his later appointment a duplicate of such return shall also be furnished the executor. The beneficiary shall pay the tax upon such insurance to the executor within 30 days after receipt of the amount, or if the executor has not then been appointed within 30 days after such appointment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that amendment, I think, is agreeable to the committee, and I make no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. In section 411, page 133, line 1, after the word "decedent," I move to insert "or beneficiary under life insurance policies."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. In section 412, page 133, line 19, after the word "transferee," I move to insert "except payment of insurance upon the life of decedent."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. In section 412, page 134, I move to strike out beginning with the words "Provided further," in line 1, and ending with "$25,000," in line 9.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. In section 412, page 134, line 12, after "period," I move to insert "except where such annuities or limited estates are created in the proceeds of insurance taxable under this title."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish at this time to present a motion to strike out all after the semicolon on page 123, line 23, down to the bottom of the page, reading as follows:

and (3) the receipt by a beneficiary of an amount of insurance in excess of $25,000 under policies taken out by the decedent upon his own life.

I do not feel disposed to present reasons for this motion in the absence of so many Members of the Senate. I deem the motion of sufficient importance to justify the serious consideration of the Senate, and I therefore ask to have that part of this amendment go over for the present.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator means subdivision (c)?

Mr. THOMAS. The last clause of subdivision (c).

Mr. SIMMONS. That is clause 3 of subdivision (c)?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; the clause beginning on line 23.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator's motion is to strike that out?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the Senator wishes that to go over?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I wish that to go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say, this being a motion to strike out and insert, of course it can not be divided, but the whole question, the chair thinks, would have to go over.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course I am not responsible for that. I do not care to discuss the motion to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Chair to mean that the whole section 402 should go over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The whole amendment, the Chair thinks, should go over, it being a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think there is no objection to that course, because, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] suggests to me, that is a long amendment, it has already been read, and it will involve no trouble when the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 137, line 12, after the word "another," to strike out "and a like tax on the amount paid for such transportation within the United States of property transported from a point without the United States to a point within the United States," so as to make the clause read:

(a) A tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation on or after such date, by rail or water or by any form of mechanical motor power when in competition with carriers by rail or water, of property by freight transported from one point in the United States to another.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have just entered the Chamber and I wish to find out whether the amendment on page 137, to strike out lines 12, 13, 14, and 15, has been agreed to. If so, I ask that the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered, because I want to oppose the adoption of that amendment. I did not know the Senate had reached that point in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We have just reached it, and the amendment has been agreed to. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted striking out lines 12 to 15, on page 137.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the next amendment was adopted I wish that reconsidered also.

Mr. SMOOT. That was not adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will go over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have had to be present in the Appropriations Committee all day, and as I did not think that the Senate would reach this part of the bill I am hardly prepared to discuss it this afternoon. Therefore I wish to ask if the chairman would object to allowing it to go over until to-morrow? I will be ready to take it up to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I shall not object.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish both amendments to go over—the one striking out lines 12, 13, 14, and 15, and the one striking out part of line 21 and lines 22, 23, and 24.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to the Senator presenting his argument now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not ready to present the argument at this time. I did not think we would reach this part of the bill to-day and I have not my papers with me; but I will be ready to take it up to-morrow if the Senator wants to take it up then.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All of subdivisions (a) and (b) of section 500 will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 138, line 10, before the word "cents," to strike out "35" and insert "42," so as to make the paragraph read:

(c) A tax equivalent to 8 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation on or after such date of persons by rail or water, or by any form of mechanical motor power on a regular established line when in competition with carriers by rail or water, from one point in the United States to another or to any point in Canada or Mexico, where the ticket or order therefor is sold or issued in the United States, not including the amount paid for commutation or season tickets for trips less than 30 miles, or for transportation the fare for which does not exceed 42 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 138, line 13, after the word "date," to insert "in connection with transportation upon which tax is imposed by subdivision (c)," so as to make the paragraph read:

The next amendment passed over was, on page 139, after line 10, to insert:

The right to exemption under this subdivision shall be evidenced in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulation prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, in section 502, page 142, after line 22, to insert:

The tax shall, without assessment by the commissioner or notice from the collector, be due and payable to the collector at the time so fixed for filing the return. If the tax is not paid when due, there shall be added as part of the tax a penalty of 5 per cent, together with interest at the rate of 1 per cent for each full month, from the time when the tax became due.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, under the head of "Insurance," in section 503, page 143, line 5, after the word "after," to strike out "November 1, 1918"; and in line 10, after the words "United States," to insert "(except those taxable under subdivision 15 of schedule A of Title XI)," so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 503. That from and after ——— there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid, in lieu of the taxes imposed by section 504 of the revenue act of 1917, the following taxes on the issuance of insurance policies, including, in the case of policies issued outside the United States (except those taxable under subdivision 15 of schedule A of Title XI), their delivery within the United States by any agent or broker, whether acting for the insurer or the insured; such taxes to be paid by the insurer, or by such agent or broker.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 143, after line 14, to strike out:

(a) Life insurance: A tax equivalent to 8 cents on each $100 or fractional part thereof of the amount for which any life is insured under any policy of insurance or other instrument, by whatever name the same is called: Provided, That on all policies for life insurance only by which a life is insured not in excess of $500, issued on the industrial or weekly or monthly payment plan of insurance, the tax shall be 40 per cent of the amount of the first weekly premium or 20 per cent of the amount of the first monthly premium, as the case may be: Provided further, That on policies of group life insurance, covering groups of not less than 25 lives in the employ of the same person, for the benefit of persons other than the employer, the tax shall be equivalent to 4 cents on each $100 of the aggregate amount for which the group policy is issued and of any net increase in the amount of the insurance under such policy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 144, line 7, before the word "Marine," to strike out "(b)" and insert "(a)."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in section 503 I desire subdivision (a), on page 144, and also subsection (b), including the remainder of the title, to go over. It all relates to marine and fire insurance. I will state frankly that the committee is considering an amendment to that title, and probably will be able to present it to the Senate on to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the title will be passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. From the point I have indicated I desire to have the remainder of the title passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The remainder of the title will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 146, line 7, after the words "tax of," to strike out "$4.40" and insert "$2.20," so as to read:

SEC. 600. (a) That there shall be levied and collected on all distilled spirits now in bond or that have been or that may be hereafter produced in or imported into the United States, except such distilled spirits as are subject to the tax provided in section 604, in lieu of the internal-revenue taxes now imposed thereon by law, a tax of $2.20.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 146, line 10, after the word "of," to strike out "$8" and insert "$6.40," so as to read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 149, line 10, after the words "tax of," to strike out "$3.30" and insert "$1.10," so as to make the paragraph read:

(c) In lieu of the internal-revenue tax now imposed thereon by law there shall be levied and collected upon all perfumes hereafter imported into the United States containing distilled spirits a tax of $1.10 per wine gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such wine gallon. Such tax shall be collected by the collector of customs and deposited as internal-revenue collections, under such rules and regulations as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, in section 628, page 177, line 3, after the word "containers," to strike out "at over 10 cents per gallon"; in the same line, after the word "tax," to strike out "of 2 cents per gallon"; and, in line 4, to insert "equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which so sold," so as to make the paragraph read:

(b) Upon all natural mineral waters or table waters, sold by the producer, bottler, or importer thereof, in bottles or other closed containers, a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which so sold.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is an amendment on page 176 which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] asked to have go over. That Senator is not present, and I will ask in his behalf that the amendment go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. What part of the bill is that?

Mr. SMOOT. It is the grape-juice provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 195, line 13, after the word "war," to insert a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 197, heretofore agreed to, and reconsidered on the motion of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], where the committee proposes to insert at the top of the page:

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment may go over for the day.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 199, after line 12, to strike out:

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I shall be glad if the Senator from North Carolina will have that amendment passed over. His colleague, the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and myself both have some observations to submit on this matter, and possibly some authorities to cite to the Senate on it.

Mr. SMOOT. And it can not be done to-day?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am hardly prepared to do so this afternoon.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well; let it go over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to record my vote against the amendment when the opportunity is presented.

Mr. HARDWICK. We are not going on with it to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand. I did not want it passed over, though, as if there were no objection to it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am asking to have it passed over for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand; but it was about to be agreed to a few days ago without objection, and I objected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let it go over, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was present, and I objected and stopped it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over without objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Section 1401.

Mr. THOMAS. I object to it.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the first-class mail provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

(c) This section shall take effect July 1, 1919.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, let that go over. It is the amendment relating to second-class mail matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. That can go over, if the Senator wishes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By agreement, section 1402 will be passed over.

That completes the reading of the bill.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 17, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. Earle Wilfley, of the Vermont Avenue Christian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O God, our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for this beautiful day, and we pray that with the coming of this day may come renewed energies for the tasks that lie before us, that Thy wisdom and Thy guidance may be our portion. We would especially pray Thy blessing upon the great institution of the Red Cross, an institution whose ministries are so blessed and st holy, as to-day and these days that follow it pleads for the support of the people. And grant upon all institutions of like character that look to the help of human kind in these days of suffering Thy divine blessing. So wilt Thou be with us this morning and always. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONGRATULATIONS FROM THE SPANISH SENATE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, which has been on hand for some time.

The Clerk read as follows:

DECEMBER 3, 1918.

The Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that a note has been received from the Ambassador of Spain at this Capital, in which he states that when the new Spanish Government, presided over by Marquis de Alhucemas, presented itself before the Congress of Deputies the president of the council of ministers declared that the foreign policy of the Government over which it presided was steered in intimate understanding with the western powers of Europe and the United States. The ambassador also states that two incidental motions, differently worded but to the same effect, were introduced offering congratulations on the termination of hostilities and on the dawning of justice over force, the basis of liberty and fraternity among the peoples. The second of these two motions was passed with only two dissenting votes. In conclusion the ambassador states that his Government desires the particularly unanimous sentiment of the Spanish Congress, which has given by its vote evidence of the earnest sympathy it cherishes toward the allied peoples and governments made known to the Congress of the United States.

A similar letter has been addressed to the President of the Senate.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ROBERT LANSING.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Chair also lays before the House a communication from the Acting Secretary of State.

DECEMBER 7, 1918.

The Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: At the request of the Spanish ambassador at this Capital, in accordance with the instructions of his Government, I have the honor to inclose for the information of the House of Representatives a translation of a note from the ambassador announcing that the Spanish Senate unanimously directed to be entered on its journal, in view of the signing of the armistice of November 11, 1918, congratulations on the peace and the triumph of justice over force.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

FRANK L. POLK,
Acting Secretary of State.

Inclosure from Spanish ambassador November 15, 1918.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will also read the communication from the Spanish ambassador.

The Clerk read as follows:

NOVEMBER 15, 1918.

The Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State of the United States.

Mr. SECRETARY: By order of my Government and with the request that you kindly make the fact known to the American Houses of Congress, I have the honor to inform you that at the session of the Spanish Senate Senor Gimeno, former minister of state, delivered a brilliant speech eulogizing peace and dedicating effusive words to all and each of the allied countries. After a short debate the Senate unanimously ordered to be entered into the journal that it congratulates itself on the peace and triumph of justice over strength.

I avail myself, etc., JUAN RIANO.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its enrolling clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 195. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a proximate vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of a class other than Members of Congress.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 195. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a proximate vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of a class other than Members of Congress; to the Committee on the Library.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. JONES was granted leave of absence for two weeks on account of important business.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD with a communication or article by John Skelton Williams, published in the November Forum on "Usury and the banks."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a communication from the Comptroller of the Currency in the November Forum on the subject of "Usury and the banks." Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how long is the article?

Mr. LOBECK. It is not a very long article; is is very short. I think probably one column will cover it.

Mr. WALSH. One column in the RECORD?

Mr. LOBECK. It is not a long article, but it is a very interesting article and covers the history of usury from the earliest dawn to the present time.

Mr. WALSH. Is it in connection with any pending legislation in the House?

Mr. LOBECK. It is in connection with banking and currency legislation that comes before the House at all times every session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13308, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13308, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13308, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13308) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Under a previous order of the House after the first paragraph of the bill is read the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is entitled to 45 minutes. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For traveling expenses of inspectors without per diem allowance, inspectors in charge, and the chief post-office inspector, and expenses incurred by inspectors not covered by per diem allowance, unusual and extraordinary expenses necessarily incurred for maintenance by inspectors over and above per diem allowance while traveling on official business in connection with the postal service of Alaska, and for the traveling expenses of four clerks performing stenographic and clerical assistance to post-office inspectors in the investigation of important fraud cases, $43,850.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, if there is no objection on the part of the chairman of the committee, I prefer to address the House when we reach page 15, at which time I am going to put in an amendment to that section. It was at that time I had arranged with the chairman and also with the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEENERSON. Why not speak now? We understand what the item is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the section of this bill that I am interested in is on page 15, which provides for an appropriation of $2,185,000 for the purchase of aeroplanes and the operation and maintenance of aeroplane service. Now, I do not want any time for any other purpose. I shall limit myself to that provision. Unfortunately, the other evening some gentleman stated that I intended to address the House on the general subject of aviation. Now, I have no desire to make any speech on anything which is not before the House. When the Army or Navy appropriation bill shall come before the House I shall then speak on that subject and give the benefit of what experience I might have gained during the past 15 months. I want to say that in opposing this particular appropriation I am not at all opposing the general proposition of transporting part of the mail by air. That is still in an experimental stage. We can save the $2,185,000 asked for in this bill and to be handed over to the Post Office Department for the purchase of aeroplanes. Now, if there is one body in the world which should have by this time accurate information on aviation it is the American Congress. We have appropriated more money for aviation in the past 15 or 16 months than any other government in the world, and we have less to show for it.

We might as well start now and discourage these piecemeal experiments, because the moment we commence experimenting in aviation we go into millions.

Now, the Second Assistant Postmaster General testified before the committee, and he has given this subject considerable study, and I am quite willing to accept his views on it. He did not ask for the $2,000,000 at all. He came before the committee—and I take it from the testimony—and asked for $300,000, and no more. In the course of the hearings it developed that $300,000 would not be enough, and in some manner and for some unknown reason they arrived at the $2,185,000 item.

Now, then, on page 60 of the testimony the Second Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Praeger, testified that he was not now in a position to say how much it would cost to carry out the general scheme of aeropost service. He asked for $300,000, and he said—and I am reading from the testimony:

> We will need more, and after we have laid out two or three of these lines I want to come back to the committee and give the detailed cost of the whole thing, and then you can determine before the bill is settled how much further you want to go on the showing we make.

That is a straight, businesslike statement. He does not know at this time how much it will cost. He says, "Let us try it out on one or two small lines, and we will see how it turns out, and then if Congress wants to go into it we can do so." Now, that is what I want to urge, namely, that we try it out, and I want to try it out with what we have on hand.

The Second Assisant Postmaster General was asked:

> Has not the Army any American aeroplanes that can be turned over to you now?

To which he replied:

> None that will fly with any dependability.

Now, if that was the Chief of the Air Service testifying in July, 1917, that answer might have been true. But the Army now has planes that we can use for this purpose.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. My understanding is that the Army has a good many planes that will do for scouting work if the weather conditions are right, but that a dependable mail service means a service going on schedule every day, winter and summer, through rain and storm, or any other kind of weather, and it takes an especially heavy machine for that purpose, and that the Army machines adapted to high speed and that sort of thing are not adapted to mail service. Is not that the case?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to have the gentleman explain that. I do not want the words "dependable service" to pass without some explanation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The machine the gentleman from Missouri describes—a machine which will fly in all sorts of weather, through rain and storm, and at all other times—does not exist. When we get to that stage, then we will have all sorts of travel and air service.

Mr. BORLAND. It is perfectly manifest that this training machine, this Curtiss machine, is not the machine for aerial mail service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will come to that in a minute. If I do not cover it, call my attention to it before I close.

Mr. LAZARO. Can the gentleman tell us something about this friction we have read about in the papers between the gentleman who had charge of this service and the Postmaster General?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have no information about that at all. I never have had the pleasure of meeting any of these gentlemen.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman read that?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; it is very interesting.

Now, a provision was made some time ago that the Army should turn over to the Post Office Department machines to carry out this service. This question was put to the Second Assistant Postmaster General, and he so testified. And the machines that they now use are Army machines. Now, then, in answer to the Postmaster General, stating that the Army had no dependable machines to turn over, I must say that the Army now has in this country 1,495 De Haviland 4's, fitted with your Liberty motor. If the Liberty motor is all you state it is, it is an ideal machine for that purpose. You have a 400-horsepower motor on the De Haviland machine, with sufficient carrying capacity for present mail requirements.

I will state to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] that the De Haviland machine is not a battle plane. It is not a pursuit machine. It is a reconnaissance, day-bombing machine. During the course of this war we did not turn out a pursuit machine, although a good many of my colleagues are under the impression that the skies of France were black with American-built battle planes. They were not. The De Haviland 4 is the nearest to an almost perfect machine that was sent abroad. And it is a reconnaissance machine, used for observation over the lines or used for day bombing. It ought to be an excellent machine to use for transportation of mails at this time.

Then we have the JN-4, with the Hispano-Suiza motor. This could be used in transportation to, say, points like Philadelphia-Washington, or New York-Philadelphia, Omaha-Milwaukee; it would be an ideal machine for short trips.

Mr. BORLAND. Those Curtiss JN-4's are light machines. They could not make head against a 110-mile gale, could they? Could they go against an ordinary winter storm and make 10 or 12 miles an hour?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No other machine will do it, either.

Mr. BORLAND. That is what is necessary in a dependable postal service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have not a machine to-day that will do that.

Mr. BORLAND. How about the De Haviland machines. Will they do that?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In a winter storm—no.

Mr. STEENERSON. Was the gentleman's attention directed to the hearings on page 48? I would like to call his attention to this language of the Second Assistant Postmaster General.

He says:

> The CHAIRMAN. We will go to the next item: "For inland transportation by steamboat or other power-boat routes or by aeroplanes," with the proviso "That out of this appropriation the Postmaster General is authorized to expend not exceeding $100,000 for the purchase, operation, and maintenance of aeroplanes for an experimental aeroplane mail service between such points as he may determine," $1,485,000, an increase of $300,000.

Now, the paragraph that the gentleman read makes it possible to purchase airplanes for the whole service. The Postmaster General did not recommend that he should have $1,485,000 with which to buy airplanes, but he said that he could use it for operation or purchase.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. What I am seeking to do is to cut off that power, so that he can not buy a single airplane. I want him to use the airplanes that we have, which otherwise will deteriorate and become obsolete, even if we leave them in the hangars. The Army and the Navy have these planes now, and the Postmaster General says this appropriation is not for this year; it is for next year.

Mr. STEENERSON. And the existing law provides that they shall turn them all over?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. Besides the machines I have mentioned, we have 100 Handley-Page machines; 12 of these have been turned over, according to the testimony of the Postmaster General, and 12 more are to be turned over. That would give 24 Handley-Page machines for immediate use in the very near future. I never flew a Handley-Page, but it can stand up against any other machine, so far as weather is concerned. But even that machine could not fly under the conditions described by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. We have these 200 Handley-Pages that will be built and turned over to the Army. Now, then, the law provides that the Army shall furnish the machines to the Post Office Department. Is it not better to use these machines for the service and utilize them instead of letting them stay in the hangars rotting away or be worn out by practice flights? A machine will last just so long, and no longer. If you leave it in the hangar it will get out of line and out of use in a certain time. If you fly it, it will fly so many hours and no more.

Mr. STEENERSON. How many hours?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, I do not know what your miraculous Liberty motor will do, but the motors that were used on the other side for war conditions you could run for 40 or 50 hours and then have them overhauled, and then run them for 40 or 50 hours more. We flew the Isotta-Fraschini upward of 80, 90, or 100 hours before they had to be overhauled. After that you can not tell when you will have a trouble or when something will happen. I do not know what the Liberty will do. I am unable to find out how many hours they will run.

Mr. EMERSON. Pardon me. Is that continuous running?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. That is engine duration.

Now, with the personnel that we have, let me see, we have in the United States 6,083 finished pilots, and we have 4,835 flying cadets. These boys are finishing their course in flying; these cadets and these pilots, immediately after they have earned their wings, after they have taken their pilot test, are not first-class pilots—not until they have had at least 40 or 50 hours in the air in cross-country flights.

Now, the intention of the Army is to give these men this training. We want to maintain, if we can, a sufficient force of trained pilots. These boys will be flying across country to make up this time, to get this experience. Why can we not utilize them in carrying on this mail service instead of having them make circles over the field and going across country in chase of an imaginary enemy? My whole purpose is to utilize what we have on hand and experiment for this year and next year before we go into this very extensive scheme of the Post Office Department.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman there as to the danger which there is in utilizing these men who have been trained. I noticed that about one a day was killed during the training period down in Texas, and so forth, and one of the officers who appeared before our Committee on Appropriations gave some very damaging testimony about the real danger in flying. The gentleman has had great experience, and I wondered whether he could say whether it was too dangerous for the Post Office Department to use in civil life.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Flying is dangerous. As long as we are going to have flying and many machines in use we are bound to have accidents. Now, if we were to carry out the scheme of carrying the mail all over the United States we are sure to have, well, a few fatal accidents every month, because when something goes wrong in the air there is nothing to hold you there. You are bound to come down. That is inevitable.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Is not the parachute practical in connection with the airplane?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, we used the parachute from the S. P.—I think I can tell you this now that the thing is over—to land agents in Austrian territory. It is very hazardous work. The machine has to be specially constructed, and landing is made under ideal conditions. But the trouble is, if something goes wrong and you get into a tail spin, you have very little opportunity to use the parachute. With time, even that may be practicable. We must, gentlemen, consider present existing conditions.

Now, as to the training, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] that these accidents are almost inevitable. The student is flying with his instructor up to a certain time, and until the instructor feels that the pupil can negotiate the machine himself he stays with the pupil; but when he is turned loose if something happens, then, of course, that is the only way of telling whether the man is able to fly. The only way is to let him fly. The instructor naturally corrects any defect of maneuvers when he is flying with his student, and he may unconsciously correct any overcontrol in banking or landing, so that when the time comes to turn this student loose he does so, and if the student is excitable or negative in flying, of course he is subject to danger. I had, I think, 496 American students in our school in Italy. I think we lost 11 men. Out of 11 we have to subtract 3 who met an accident through a collision in the air, so that we lost perhaps 8 men in the course of their training. It is possible in time of peace, when the training is slower and there is no need of turning them out rapidly, to reduce the number of accidents, but accidents are unavoidable.

Mr. FESS. Is there anything in the statement that numerous accidents are due to unusually hazardous stunts in the air, where you are maneuvering to get away from an enemy, which would not be required if the flier were in the mail service?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, absolutely; the boys who take up pursuit work have to train in what they call stunt flying; it is not stunts, it is aerobatics. It is necessary to so train in order to be able to skillfully maneuver and get around or away from an enemy plane. It is the whole thing in aerial combat. Although the boy might turn out well in straight and preliminary flying, when he gets to doing advanced maneuvers there is great danger. In the mail service we would not have that; it would not enter into the mail service at all. The danger would be limited to forced landings, losing course of route, defective materials, and the like.

Mr. FESS. That was the query in my mind, whether the mail service would be as dangerous in training an aviation corps.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Absolutely not. It would be the regular cross-country flying. If we have a good system of training and discipline all through the service we can keep fatal accidents down. For instance, the Postmaster General suggests that he is going to start regular service between Chicago and San Francisco immediately after the war. He can not do anything of the kind. We are in no more condition to start flying from Chicago to San Francisco than we were in the spring of 1917 in sending over a hundred thousand planes to France. We have to make some preparation, and I might as well take that up now as at any time. If he starts from San Francisco to Chicago he has the whole country to cross, and it will require considerable preparation.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman from New York be not interrupted. His remarks are very interesting. If he is constantly interrupted his statement is disconnected and will not be as satisfactory as it otherwise would be.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the matter is entirely in the hands and control of the gentleman from New York. He can decline to be interrupted.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am anxious to give all the information that I can, and will cheerfully answer questions. The Postmaster General suggests that we will open these lines and promises to take mails from Chicago to San Francisco, passing through Cheyenne and Omaha, and from Minneapolis to Laredo, Tex., immediately upon conclusion of the war.

We can not do that. We have not the fields; we have not the men; we have not the signal system; we have no preparation at all to undertake a gigantic scheme of that size. If we start the delivery of mail from Chicago to San Francisco we would have to establish landing places every so many miles, or radio control stations, if he is going to do the flying by night, as he promises, or we would have to establish perfect light signal stations all the way across.

When we were flying from our field over into the territory of the enemy to bomb them we would have regular light signals every 30 kilometers up to our lines, and if it was a nice, moonlight night we could follow the enemy signals for their own planes which were out of our territory.

Flying at night is easy to say, but unless you are flying over a river that you can see at all times or over your own fields or over flat country, it is a difficult thing to do. They have developed to a certain extent radio control that will be perfected in a very short time. This control keeps the machines within the radio station. But all these things must be established and are necessary before we can establish a line from Chicago to San Francisco. Inasmuch as the Army is now experimenting with these very things, and inasmuch as we have appropriated money for the Army to do that very thing, let them do it in connection with this service. Then we will have not only a real air service for military purposes but also a well-regulated postal air service. Then the money appropriated for the Army will not have been entirely wasted, while every cent that is appropriated for this purpose is apart from that, and the amount appropriated here is enough to carry out the whole scheme.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman stated that he wanted to give all the information he could. When the ground was selected for aviation camps it was said that they were selected with a view of making them permanent, so that they could be used in the carrying of the mail and passengers and packages, and so on. Does the gentleman know how that would work and if there was any foundation for that?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As to that I will say that in the State of Texas we have 10 fields. We have one in Oklahoma and a few scattered around in that region; there are some in Illinois and one in Michigan, but between Chicago and California there are none.

Mr. LAZARO. We have a very good one at Lake Charles, in my district.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is not a single field between Chicago and San Francisco. We have some in the southern part of California and one in about the central part. But all that territory of the United States between Chicago and the Pacific coast and from Canada to the Gulf, through the Central States, has no fields. So we would have to establish fields all along the line.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it a difficult matter to establish fields? Is it a serious proposition?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is not serious, but it is very expensive.

Mr. RANDALL. Nothing but the expense?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is one thing that I am worrying about. Of course, the gentleman will admit that it is somewhat difficult to find a field where you can land in the Rocky Mountains. You can not land a plane on a mountain peak.

There is no doubt that we have sufficient machines in the Army and the Navy to carry out every reasonable undertaking that the Post Office Department desires to experiment on. No doubt about that.

Now, as to the personnel. We have to train young men to fly. A good many men who have not had the opportunity to go abroad are eager and anxious to do a little more flying. They know that they are not expert fliers, and they want to get all the experience they can. So this would furnish an excellent opportunity to establish the air postal service with the personnel that it now has on hand.

The Postmaster General says that in order to carry out the scheme he presents to the committee he will require a thousand pilots which he intends to pay $300 a month, 1,000 mechanics which he will pay $160 a month, and 1,500 helpers.

The total amounts to $7,575,000. That is for personnel alone. The Army could furnish the same number of men, and on their present pay it would cost only $4,261,500, a difference of $3,313,500; but I say that we would save more—I say that it is a saving of the entire amount of $7,000,000 if the Army Air Service carries this mail. The Army is going to spend this money anyhow, and these men will be flying over the fields, or in formation flying in the air, if we do not use them for the post office. There is a total saving of $7,000,000 on the personnel. That is something which can be easily figured. But when you take the whole United States and endeavor to establish an air service with as many machines as it will require, we are going into the hundreds of millions of dollars. All the experience the post office has had to-day is with one trip a day from New York to Washington, and as Mr. Praeger said, he is not in a position to say now how much it will cost for maintenance and operation in the elaborate plan of aerial mail routes he proposes.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman says only one machine?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is, a day.

Mr. MOON. There is a service from New York to Chicago.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When will that start?

Mr. MOON. It has been started, I am informed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think it started yesterday, did it not?

Mr. MOON. No; I think some time ago.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A gentleman called at my office yesterday from the Assistant Postmaster General, and he stated that it would start either yesterday or to-day.

Mr. MOON. I understand that is additional service to those points and to others, but that it can not be started to-day by reason of the fact that the War Department has refused to turn over machines under previous acts of Congress which were to be used for that purpose, and hold that the statute was directory and not mandatory, and, therefore, they were not bound to do that. The General Staff has made an order that deprived the Post Office Department of these machines.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Very well; we will make it mandatory.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That service has started a good many times, but I believe it has never yet functioned.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; and it will not for some time, and it can not. The establishment of an organization to fly from Chicago to New York is no simple matter. That is quite a flight, and if you are establishing a daily service between New York and Chicago, I will say to the chairman of the committee that it will not be regularly systematized and running daily for a year or a year and a half.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am interested in this matter, and I would like to ask the gentleman one question: If you are going to take the flyers from the Army or the Navy, how do you expect to get them? By volunteering on the part of the men, or does the gentleman assume that the War Department would have the power to detail a man who had enlisted for military service to do civilian work? Has the gentleman gone into that?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Absolutely, and unless we do that we are going to have an Army and a Navy on our hands which is not up to date. You have to give all of these men practical experience. I will go further and say that I do not see any reason why we can not use our Navy for transporting mails and cargo. I would sooner have the ships used in useful occupation than chasing around the ocean in wild flights. We are coming to that.

The type of planes which will eventually be used for carrying mail will be the multiengine type of bombing machine. The piloting of these ships in day and night flights, under varying conditions of weather, will develop in our pilots the very skill in air navigation that is required in time of war, and the element of regularity involves a disciplinary factor that is of great importance. The practical training that our mechanics would receive is obvious, and it will also bring about constant development of material through the experience gained by many hours of flight under widely varying conditions. As an example of this we may cite the use of radio direction apparatus. I spoke about that a moment ago. Also radiotelephony, improvements in compasses, automatic stabilizers, improvements in various other things, which will give us the very opportunity that we are looking for to develop a real air service.

I will not go into the work of the Air Service during the war. At the proper time, if the House desires to hear about it, I shall tell them what I know. I am willing to spill the beans if you want the information.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. I was going to ask the gentleman if he would give us some information on how our American-made planes compared with the planes made by the countries in Europe.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman that he will have to find somebody of more experience than I have had. I have been flying for only 15 months. I have been at both fronts, but I have never seen an American plane.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman's recommendation is that the air service that carries the mail shall be under the direction and control of the War Department?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; I would not recommend that. My suggestion would be that the Post Office Department outline the routes and call upon the War Department to turn over the planes to carry the mail.

Mr. MANN. I am speaking of the carrying of the mail.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That that is to be under the operation of the War Department after the mail leaves the post office and is put on the aeroplanes?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And delivered, just as it is now carried by a railway or a steamboat.

Mr. MANN. Personally, I do not see why that might not be feasible, although, as a rule, departments do not work well together.

Mr. MOON. Does not the gentleman think it would be better for the War and Navy Departments to turn over their aeroplanes to the Post Office Department for the purpose of carrying the mail, that being its function? The Post Office Department could use the aviators under proper regulations.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, we are going to have a united air service, there is no doubt about that, unless we continue to waste millions of dollars. We have now the Army service, the Navy service, the Marine service, the Postal Service; we have the Bureau of Standards experimenting; we have five different branches of the Government wasting millions, and if we unite all of them, the same as England has done and Italy is doing and France is doing, we will save millions—not thousands, but millions. We are coming to that, and when we have this service it will be the easiest thing in the world to take care of all the needs of the Post Office Department. What I am trying to do is, inasmuch as the Post Office only desires to experiment—it asks nothing for the present; they say they have enough machines for this year—let us save this $2,000,000 and use the machines and personnel we have to carry on this scheme if they want to carry it out.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will pardon the interruption, it seems to me to be as reasonable for the Post Office Department to ask to operate the engines on the railroad as to operate these.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is an analogous case.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do.

Mr. TOWNER. I desire to make only this suggestion: There would be no difficulty whatever in the War Department detailing those who are engaged in the aviation service, and especially those who are learning the aviation service, for work under direction of the Post Office Department—that is, they could be detailed especially for that purpose under the direction of the Post Office Department. They could just as well be detailed in the matter as detailed for service in an aviation school or on the practicing field, or any other way?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is merely a detail to work out. What we have before us now is, let us stop a waste of $2,000,000.

Mr. TOWNER. I entirely agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do.

Mr. BORLAND. As I understand the gentleman's recommendation, it is that the pilots and machines, the system now built up by the War Department, shall be utilized in carrying these mails?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman believes that will be a great benefit to the military aerial service to keep abreast of the times by actual experiment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And incidentally will be a great help to the Post Office Department.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it not likely to work the other way? Is it not likely to hamper and restrict the Postal Service in developing the carrying of the mails properly? Would not the Post Office be restricted in that case to the kind of machines that the military were building and furnishing or were willing to furnish?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If that were true, if we had the machines which were of the kind needed, if there is such a machine which is so good it will carry the mails in all weathers, under all conditions, that is the kind the Army wants.

Mr. BORLAND. Suppose the Postal Service finds that a machine adapted to the work of the Postal Service is not in existence and it wants such a machine created and put in the service. How could the Army furnish that?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Army is experimenting all the time. Let us call it the air service. The air service is experimenting all the time to get just a machine of that kind, and if it is good enough to carry the mails it is good enough to carry bombs for any future war. I trust there will never be another.

Mr. BORLAND. The Army might say that their requirements are totally different; that they want a single-seater, a pursuit machine, of high power. It is not a question with the Army that they are to carry a certain quantity of weight, but what they want is a high power, speedy machine. Now——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; I am not willing to admit that what we want is a high-powered machine. You have been led to believe that for the past 16 months. It was not adopting an engine to existing conditions, but what was attempted was to adopt everything to that particular motor—the planes, war conditions, weather, the elements, everything had to be changed to ufilize your motor. It was all wrong. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Is it not a fact, however, that the machine that is going to be adopted for postal and commercial service will be a heavier and slower machine than the military machine?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It will be an ideal bombing machine.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to call attention to this, that the Army would have been at a great loss in its motor-truck service if it had not been for the high development of commercial motor trucks and if it had not been for the training of a large number of commercial chauffeurs, and the Army had those immediately to draw from. Suppose they had not had any commercial apparatus or aviators, that we did not have any commercial or postal machines for the Army to draw upon in a future war, that everything was military. Would that be an advantage?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; it is entirely different. We are still in the experimental stage in aviation, and all the Post Office Department is trying to do is to try this out. I want to save money—I think that is our duty—unless I am entirely wrong, unless it is not the intention of this Congress to save money. If we continue to appropriate the way we are, I do not know how we are going to pay for it. I am concerned, inasmuch as my State pays a big part of the taxes of the United States. I think we ought to have something to say about it. As I said, we are still in the experimental stage, and what we are trying to do now is to centralize the experiments. When we arrive at the commercial-machine period, as we have in the motor truck and automobiles, and they can be as safely operated, it will be time then to give the Post Office machines of its own to operate.

Mr. LAZARO. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman said a while ago that these men who are now at these aviation camps could be used to better advantage carrying the mails.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Is that correct?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman does not mean to say that we would have no aviation camps where these men could do these stunts and practice for war purposes in cases of emergency. You would not want to use them all in the mail service?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Before he starts to do his stunts, if we can give him a good deal of flying he will acquire the art of advanced flying much easier. We could give the pilot the preliminary training experience in actual cross-country flying and then go into aerobatics. We could make three or four months' postal flying part of the course after he has taken his pilot's test. That would give him what he needs, actual experience. If we can give each pilot three or four months of postal flying and then train him further in aerobatics, if he desires, we would then have an ideal expert flying pilot.

Mr. LAZARO. What does the gentleman think, with the number of aviation camps we have in this country, as to the advantage of using them in the future during peace times? Can the gentleman give me any thought concerning that?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. All I know is what Gen. Foulois told me on that. And he said in laying out the fields he had in mind the future commercial use. On the map that I have before me, as I said before, we have no fields from Illinois to California at all, and, of course, we would have to lay out a series of fields all along the line.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I understand the gentleman to say, in addition to these items, the Government has not—with a route from Indianapolis to Texas and from Chicago to San Francisco—the Government has not the money?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Neither has the Post Office, and if we got $2,000,000, and even if we start a regular service from Chicago to New York and start to buy planes and learn what it costs to keep up these planes, they will come back with a $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 deficit in the next appropriation bill. That, gentlemen, is absolutely certain. Two hundred thousand dollars is not enough, and it will get the Post Office Department in considerable trouble. It will cost us several millions more, unless we take it out of their hands entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

Mr. MOON. I have no objection to his getting five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire whether or not the Liberty motor has proven itself a successful carrying motor?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. The Liberty motor is a good motor. It is a good motor, but that is all. Why should it not be? The greatest industrial country in the world stopped everything to build it. It is a good 400-horsepower motor. It is not a miracle; it is not a new discovery. There is nothing on that motor that is new. But you stopped everything to build the Liberty motor. I will tell you more about it the next chance I get.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How many American-built battle planes were on the battle front?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman mean pursuit planes?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There was not one—not an American machine of any kind.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. For just a question.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks happened to the mail service in France when it was taken away from the Post Office Department?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When? Will the gentleman give me the date?

Mr. RANDALL. The date was six months after we went into the war that the Post Office Department turned the whole thing over to the Army.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. France at that time had all she could do.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not talking about France, but our own mail service to our boys in France.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We never had anything like that.

Mr. RANDALL. We never had any mail service?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We never had any mail service.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman does not understand the question. The gentleman is aware that the Post Office Department attempted to conduct a mail service to our boys in France for a number of months. Then, finding the Army was unwilling to cooperate in the delivery of the mail, they turned the entire service over to the Army. Was the service better under Army regulations as compared with Post Office regulations?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That was not aerial. I do not know anything about that.

Let us not repeat the errors of 1917 and give a million dollars to everybody who wants to come in and wants to try to experiment on aviation. [Applause.] That was my whole purpose in taking up your time. If we give them this $2,000,000 and they commence to buy aeroplanes and establish a New York-Chicago-San Francisco line and a Minneapolis-Laredo line, it will go into $100,000,000.

Mr. MOON. I very fully agree with the gentleman that we do not need the $2,000,000 carried in this bill for that purpose, provided that the department may get, as the law authorizes it, the aeroplanes from the War and Navy Departments. But the gentleman perhaps is not advised of the fact that the department can not get them, although we passed the act, as it holds that the act is not mandatory and they refuse to turn over the planes now. Now, this bill might be amended so as to authorize the Post Office Department to take a certain number of those machines over and avoid this large expense.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You ought to make the law mandatory, and the War Department might as well know now that the American Congress is going to run the War Department, and that the War Department is not going to run Congress. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. MOON. You are right about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of expressing the hope that one or more of the inspectors mentioned in the paragraph of the bill last read, or some other inspectors of the Post Office Department, may visit that part of the State of Washington just west of Puget Sound, with a view to ameliorating mail transportation conditions there, which are not good.

Mr. MOON. What paragraph does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire, if the chairman will permit, to call attention to certain conditions in the mail-carrying service. To come from the interesting discussion of the aerial mail service just held, in which the distinguished New York Congressman, Maj. LAGUARDIA, pointed out the probability that we are to waste millions of the public money, to a statement about rural and steamboat routes and the bad existing service seems like a fearful and frightful drop.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, it will not do to appropriate millions for an air service and to seriously propose air routes from Chicago to San Francisco and from Minnesota to Texas and at the same time let the little routes which actually serve the people in out-of-the-way places go entirely to pieces. And, strangely enough, the changes which seem to have made the trouble in portions of the districts represented by my colleagues, Messrs. MILLER and HADLEY, and myself, were made under a mistaken notion of economy—the sort of penny-wise and pound-foolish economy that we so often see.

It seems that during the summer contracts were let for carrying the mails on various parts of Puget Sound and tributaries, and that whenever possible steamboat contracts were abandoned and contracts let to automobile carriers. The result is that many autos are struggling over mountainous routes in a country where the natural routes are by water. Possibly some small money is saved, but the mail service is impaired out of all proportion to the economy. For instance, one route that was 8 miles by water is now 115 miles by a combination of water, auto, and carrier; a route that formerly was covered in 45 minutes is now covered in anywhere from 24 hours to 5 days. Further, the cutting out of the steamboat mail service into Hoods Canal has caused the auto mail to arrive at the landings at changed hours and has thrown the connecting star routes out of kilter, necessitating either changed hours or unsatisfactory service, or both. I bring this matter up on the floor, Mr. Chairman, beause part of the routes are under the jurisdiction of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General and part in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, and it is not easy to secure the necessary liaison.

How can we find a way to bring these two officers together in the hope of finding the right thing to do for routes that can be either automobile or steamboat? I have availed of this opportunity in the hope that the two Assistant Postmasters General, the Second and the Fourth, will see that it is necessary either for the inspectors or some one selected, respectively, from their two offices to get together and establish steamboat routes in a country where water routes are preferable to automobile routes over the mountains. [Applause.]

Both offices are busy and the Post Office Department is busy always, but especially so now, with grand, visionary, and expensive schemes, and I hope that before we get too far along with these grand experimental appropriations we should get busy in the hope of restoring the transportation of the mails to some degree of efficiency. Before we authorize $2,000,000 for new mail airplanes and $7,000,000 for air pilots' salaries, let us put the steamboat routes back, if they are the natural routes, even if they do cost a few dollars more than a "jitney" service. I hope the proper officials will take note, so I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington withdraws his pro forma amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitutes for clerks and employees absent without pay.

And to provide for the promotion of 85 per cent of the clerks in first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade, and for the promotion of 15 per cent of the clerks in the sixth grade to the designation of "special clerk" in the $1,300 grade, and for the promotion of 15 per cent of the designated "special clerks" in the $1,300 grade to the designation of "special clerk" in the $1,400 grade, and to provide for the promotion of 85 per cent of the clerks in second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade, and for the promotion of 15 per cent of the clerks in second-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade: And provided further, That there may also be employed at first-class post offices foremen and stenographers at a salary of $1,300 or more per annum; in all, $55,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all the language from line 14, on page 10, down to and including the words "per annum," on page 11, on the second line.

The reason for that is that we provide later on in the bill for the automatic promotion of the men that this refers to, and it would be superfluous language.

Mr. MOON. What language does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. MADDEN. To provide for the promotion of the carriers and all that. This would be in conformity with the language carried later.

Mr. MOON. If it is carried later on, it would be superfluous here. Let the motion be put and agreed to now, and if we do not carry the other matter we can come back to this.

Mr. MADDEN. All right. I am willing to let this matter pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the language from line 14, page 10, to line 2 of page 11. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For allowances to third-class post offices to cover the cost of clerical services, $3,300,000: Provided, That hereafter no allowance in excess of $450 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,000, $1,100, or $1,200; nor in excess of $600 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,300, $1,400, or $1,500; and that no allowance in excess of $750 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,600 or $1,700; nor in excess of $1,200 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,800 or $1,900: Provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in the disbursement of this appropriation, expend not exceeding $600,000 for the employment, at a maximum salary of $900 per annum, of assistant postmasters at post offices of the third class where the salary of the postmaster is $1,800 or $1,900 per annum.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I would like to offer to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: Page 12, line 12, strike out "$450" and insert "$600." In line 14, strike out "$600" and insert "$900." In line 15, strike out "$750" and insert "$1,000."

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, as you will observe, raises the clerk hire in the third-class post offices where it is necessary to employ clerical assistance. Now, I think anyone will understand that in a post office such as exists in western Pennsylvania, in the district I have the honor to represent, that puts up mail for rural carriers or serves a large local constituency, or puts up mail for branch railroads, where it is necessary to employ a clerk that is intelligent, that has good judgment, a clerk who is educated in order to efficiently discharge that service the sum of $450 per year is an entirely inadequate compensation. The same is true of the next item there, $600. That is at the rate of $50 a month. That has proved to be inadequate; and $750, which is only $60 per month, has also proven to be inadequate.

I have received many complaints, and I have in mind now four different post offices where the postmasters have been compelled to quit because they could not themselves discharge the service required in the office and where it was impossible to employ clerical assistance to discharge the duties of the post office.

The mails come in in the morning. They must be made up and sent out by rural routes, or they must be made up and sent out on branch railroads, and in order to discharge that service there must be an intelligent and competent clerk employed in the post office, and you can not employ them for $450 or $600 or $750 per year. In these third-class offices the salary of the postmaster ranges from $1,000 to $1,400, and the pay of the clerk is entirely inadequate for the service performed. It is unfair to expect it. You do not expect it in private life. You can not get that kind of service for that money. Clerks that can do that work in the post offices and discharge the duties efficiently find better employment and higher wages in civil life and they leave the post offices.

I have in mind two offices where that is true—one is Derry station and the other Manor station in my district. The postmasters have assured me that they could not keep clerical help. The postmaster at Derry quit because he could not get additional clerk hire. It is wrong. We ought to pay them sufficient to employ competent clerical help to discharge the duties. The mail is heavy. The rural routes run out of these places and the branch railroad runs from one of them, and the service that is placed upon them is very heavy.

The mail is very large in amount, it must be handled in time for the rural carriers to leave every day on time, and in order to meet the trains the distribution must all be done in the morning in the space of an hour and a half or two hours. It requires competent clerical help, and it is unfair to expect that service unless we compensate for it. I have asked that an increase be made by my admendment to this bill that is reasonable and not exorbitant.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know that these figures are 50 per cent higher than they ever were before?

Mr. ROBBINS. I can not help that; they are not enough.

Mr. MADDEN. After examination the committee thought that this was adequate, as it is a 50 per cent increase.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is insufficient, so the postmasters tell me.

Mr. MADDEN. But they do not know anything about this.

Mr. ROBBINS. You can not employ a clerk to devote his time to postal matters for $450 per year.

Mr. REED. They only get $350 now.

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not care; that was grossly inadequate, and this bill provides a sum which is inadequate. The increase that I ask is not unreasonable, but on the other hand the increases are proper and will be sufficient to obtain the postal service required.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will not agree to this amendment. The estimate for this branch of the service is $3,000,000. We increase it $600,000. The committee thought it was very liberal on this item, perhaps more so than on any other item in the bill, when it provides a straight increase of 50 per cent along these lines. The committee thought it was enough. They have been getting along fairly well at the present figures, and we, realizing the conditions, thought that they ought to have a little more. It was the unanimous opinion of the committee that this was sufficient.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. CANNON. I call the gentleman's attention to the language "not in excess" of these sums. Why not make the pay absolute?

Mr. MOON. No; we ought not to do that, because in some places they do not need it; we do not want to give it where it is not needed. To give every one a straight increase, in many instances the offices are going back from third into fourth class, or very close to it.

Mr. CANNON. But we do not give any increase to fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. MOON. Yes; we do.

Mr. CANNON. Those that are under $1,000.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think there is any allowance made for them.

Mr. MOON. We will come to it after a while, when the gentleman will find that in fourth-class offices the postmasters receive 100 per cent instead of 80 on the first quarter, and 60 instead of 50 as the law now provides, and they receive all the emoluments of the office provided for by law outside of that.

Where the salary is less than $50 they receive a straight increase of 20 per cent.

Mr. CANNON. My recollection is in former years, when I was familiar with Post Office appropriation bills, there was an allowance for separation up to a certain point. That, I suppose, is still retained.

Mr. MOON. There is no change in the law on that subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will not adopt the radical increases proposed in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. ROBBINS. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman will understand that the amendment I offered is not in excess of these amounts. The Postmaster General will still have discretion.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am quite advised as to the purpose and also the language of the amendment. Ten years ago we granted no allowance whatever for clerk hire to postmasters of the third class. They were limited exclusively to their salary of $1,000 up to $1,900, according to the grade. There were small offices just about the same as fourth-class offices where the receipts total in the smaller offices $1,900 a year. You are all acquainted with that character of office. It was called to the attention of the Post Office Committee that in some instances there was need of an allowance for clerks to relieve the postmaster during the time when he went to meals, or, perchance, when the mails came in in large quantities. So the committee adopted the provision of allowing a minimum allowance, as I recollect, of $100 additional in these offices up to $1,200, $200 from $1,300 to $1,500, $300 from $1,600 to $1,700, and $400 from $1,800 to $1,900. That was a gradual increase. And, mind you, it is not a salary to be paid clerks, but it is an additional compensation to the postmaster—giving him the money whether he employs additional clerical assistance or not. It is an outright increase of the salary of the postmaster. In the present Post Office bill there is privileged to be paid by the postmaster $300 in the first grade, $400 in the second, $500 in the third, and $800 in the last. The committee this year in the bill—and you will find the increase allowed so that the Postmaster General is privileged to increase the postmaster's allowance to a compensation of $300 to $450 in the first grade, and it is now proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to double it.

In the second grade the committee recommends an increase from $400 to $600, and the gentleman's amendment proposes to increase it to $900, more than double what he can receive at the present time.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is talking about my amendment, and I will ask him if he will yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does not the gentleman know that the amendment I offer merely increases the maximum?

Mr. STAFFORD. It fixes the maximum.

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman know that the postmaster himself is allowed whatever that is, not to exceed the certain amount fixed? That is an increase in compensation, and that is what I am protesting against. The Postmaster General, in the administration of this fund, determines what the maximum amount shall be to these respective officers. The third-class postmaster receives it. The postmaster is not obliged to give any accounting of that fund whatsoever, as to whether he employs clerical assistance or not. It is a pure increase of compensation. What does the gentleman propose to do? Where the salary is $1,300 to $1,500, where the maximum allowance now is $400, he proposes to increase the third-class postmaster's allowance to $900, more than double the amount.

Mr. ROBBINS. Oh, the gentleman misquotes my amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to misquote the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. It makes it $600 in that amount, and it is only allowed in case of a written recommendation.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I caught the gentleman's amendment, it is $900 maximum in cases where the salary is $1,300, $1,400, and $1,500. Am I in error about that?

Mr. ROBBINS. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is what I protest against, and to-day, under existing law, it is $400. The gentleman surely does not know that, otherwise he would not have the temerity to offer this unusual increase of compensation to third-class postmasters.

Mr. ROBBINS. Oh, I am quite acquainted with existing law; I read it before I prepared this amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I will give the gentleman full credit. I did not think he was.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the gentleman's time extended for one minute.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I will ask to have it extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Is the House to understand that the gentleman is attempting to make it appear that the postmaster is paid the money for these clerks? Is not the money paid direct to the clerks?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, by no means. The gentleman is not acquainted with the operation of the third-class post offices in his own State, where there are hundreds of third-class post offices. He is not acquainted with the administration of those third-class post offices. I suggest to him when he has an opportunity, and I know that he has not had much opportunity of late to get into the field, when he gets back in his State to make inquiry of some third-class postmaster and ascertain whether he does not put that allowance right into his pocket.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. They may do that in Wisconsin, but they do not do it in Idaho.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the fact is that that is the universal practice.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman has not yet answered my question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have directly answered it with a very positive no. I could not answer it more positively. There is no direct clerk allowance for these respective postmasters. The postmaster does not have to make any accounting as to whether he employs a clerk or not. It is pure compensation. Call up the Post Office Department and you will find that my position is correct. I would not be speaking so positively if I did not know whereof I speak.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to an expert on postal matters.

Mr. BLACK. I came in while the gentleman was speaking, and it is my understanding that the department always carefully ascertains the need for this clerk hire before the allowance is made.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe that the Post Office Department inquires as to the amount of business, and parcels out this allowance uniformly, based on the amount of business. If I am in error about that, I yield to the gentleman to correct me.

Mr. BLACK. I think the gentleman is substantially correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the money does not go to any clerks, it goes to the postmaster.

Mr. BLACK. He pays it out.

Mr. STAFFORD. He does not have to account for it at all. That is the main position that I am contending about here.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. REED. As my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] stated, there are not so many places, but there are places with unusual conditions, that are terminals for several rural routes. Would the amount in line 9, $200,000, reach those unusual cases, if they do exist?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the gentleman will have to go to a prior paragraph. Those relate to something arising of an emergency character and not a permanent character.

Mr. REED. It seems to me that this ought to be elastic. Some might not need $400 to $600, and another might need as much as $700.

Mr. STAFFORD. That unusual condition applies to all post offices.

Mr. ROUSE. Such as exists at Nitro, W. Va.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has suggested Nitro, W. Va., where the conditions arose very suddenly, and this was the fund from which the department was authorized to provide for those exigent conditions.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. My understanding is that they do not pay any more than the postmaster certifies he is paying for clerk hire. Is not that correct?

Mr. STAFFORD. No. Of course, it is some time since I served on the Post Office Committee, and I am speaking from recollection, but I have the assurance of gentlemen on the committee that that is not the rule. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE] so states.

Mr. BURNETT. I know that some time ago at the request of the postmaster I made application for increased clerk hire, and they turned to a file and said that they were giving him all that he was paying out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was that a second-class office?

Mr. BURNETT. In a third-class office.

Mr. ROUSE. In addition to this allowance the postmaster is also entitled to 3 cents on each money order that he issues.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; that is additional compensation. I have said sufficient to show that there can not be any justification for the unusual increase as proposed in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I hope that it will be voted down.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does not the gentleman know that in each instance where application is made for additional clerk hire the postmaster is required to state the amount of service he performs, the hours when it is performed, and the amount of clerical assistance required, which is then submitted to the post-office inspector, and that they are never allowed more than they certify they have to pay for this clerical service? That is my information from the postmaster who complained to me.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is quite accurate in his statement of the minutia of administration by which these allowances are obtained.

Mr. ROBBINS. If that is true is it not a fact that no part is allowed to the postmaster as additional salary, but allowed as clerk hire strictly?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is allowed as additional salary, and the postmaster does not have to give any accounting whatever as to the use of that fund. He can put it in his pocket and may employ the members of his own family and not pay them anything. It is a question of administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers at offices already established, including substitutes for letter carriers absent without pay, and for the promotion of 85 per cent of the letter carriers in the first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade, and for the promotion of 85 per cent of the letter carriers in second-class post offices from the fourth to the fifth grade, and for the promotion of 15 per cent of the letter carriers in second-class offices from the fifth to the sixth grade, City Delivery Service, $41,000,000: Provided, That hereafter all days set aside by the President of the United States as holidays to be observed by other departments of the Government, shall be construed as holidays within the meaning and intent of the postal holiday laws, and postal employees performing service on such holidays shall be granted either compensatory time off or pay for overtime.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise for information to inquire what days would be considered holidays for the benefit of postal employees under this paragraph which are not now so construed under existing law?

Mr. MOON. I am not able to inform the gentleman as to all the holidays which are provided by law in the country, but the department says there are special holidays proclaimed by the President that are not applicable to the Post Office Department. We did not inquire into the item as to what they were, because we regarded that as immaterial. The Post Office Department thought they ought to have them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the purpose that when the President sets aside, for instance, a half-day holiday for the clerks in Washington that the postal employees in the field shall be accorded the benefit of that half holiday?

Mr. MOON. I think not in the field, because the departmental service is entirely different from the Postal Service.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the phraseology of this amendment would be broad enough to carry that, because it says "all days set aside by the President of the United States as holidays to be observed by other departments of the Government shall be construed as holidays within the meaning and intent of the postal holiday laws." We all know days are set aside by the President for half holidays in the departments.

Mr. MOON. Suppose under that order the employees of the Treasury Department in cities throughout the country were entitled to half a day, for the same reason the post-office people think they ought to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question if the proclamation of the President is extended to departmental employees in the field that the postal employees should be accorded the same privilege.

Mr. AYRES. The gentleman will notice the third line from the bottom of the paragraph; it says, "within the meaning and intent of the postal holiday laws."

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. Those are now defined and prescribed.

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Consisting of the main holidays of the year.

Mr. MOON. This is going to add to them such holidays as may be proclaimed by the President.

Mr. STAFFORD. For departmental employees.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if my colleague will yield, during the summer months in the city of Washington, as we all know, there is a half holiday each Saturday afternoon beginning, I believe, in June or July and running through until September. I do not know whether that is proclaimed by an order of the President or whether it is simply a departmental custom.

Mr. MOON. I think each department makes its own order.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I believe it is a presidential order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am quite certain it is.

Mr. MOON. If it should be by Executive order instead of by order of the departments, which could be done, it would be an Executive proclamation on that subject, and of course it ought to apply, notwithstanding what the provision may be to the contrary in the postal laws, to the postal employees.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know whether I am prepared to agree thoroughly with my colleague about that or not—whether the reasons for giving half holidays during the heated months to the departmental employees here in the city of Washington would apply with equal force to every rural and city carrier——

Mr. MOON. No; I did not say that. I said it applied with equal force to the departmental people in Washington.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course it does apply to the departmental people in Washington, but, if my colleague will permit, this further uses the expression, in line 15, "and postal employees performing service on such holidays shall be granted either compensatory time or pay for overtime." As I construe that——

Mr. MOON. That has application only, of course, to a general proclamation of the President declaring not a holiday in the District of Columbia, but a general holiday for the whole United States.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is the construction of it?

Mr. MOON. If the proclamation covers the country, and there is anything in the postal laws that would prevent in some instances post-office employees from enjoying that holiday, this is intended to relieve that situation. As to what extent the postal laws do that I am not aware.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I can see the equity of that——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee think it would be well to offer an amendment, beginning line 14, to read as follows: Insert "throughout the United States," so that it will read "that hereafter all days set aside by the President of the United States as holidays to be observed by other departments of the Government throughout the United States shall be construed as holidays," and so forth?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, I think that would make it clear.

Mr. MOON. But here would be left a situation, and if there is any provision in the postal law or any construction in that law that when a holiday was ordered by the President of the United States for the city of Washington and for employees of other departments the Post Office Department could not enjoy it, they ought to have it. I do not know that the construction would justify that position, but in view of the fact the department's recommendation is along that line, it occurs to me, so far as the departmental holiday or proclamation may be concerned, if there be one, it ought to apply to the post-office people. And, if the proclamation applies to the whole country, it ought to apply to them.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. The purpose simply was to give the same rights to the post-office employee, notwithstanding the provisions of some of the postal laws that might deny them, that are given to the other employees of the Government, both in the departments and in the field.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does my colleague think that if there should be inserted the language suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] at the place suggested it would prevent them in the cases I have specifically mentioned—that is, where the departments here have their half holidays during the heated months—from having it?

Mr. MOON. That language there would unquestionably cover the case, as the text does, when the proclamation reached to the whole country, but it would operate as an exclusion so far as the department is concerned.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So far as the practice is concerned, there surely is no law, because those in the Post Office Department have these half holidays.

Mr. MOON. They did have them for a time, but they were controlled, I understand, by the department. They did not enter upon them at the same time as some of the other departments did, I am informed, and did not end them at the same time. Personally I do not know how that is.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. SISSON. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], if this language is applied in all of its force, would mean if the Treasury Department should be granted by Executive order a half holiday in the city of Washington this law would make it apply then to all the employees in the Post Office Department, not only in the city of Washington but throughout the country?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; I hardly think so.

Mr. SISSON. I think it was the manifest purpose of that clause to give to the employees outside of the District of Columbia the same rights and privileges that they get inside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That may be the purpose of this proviso, but I think the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas would cure that proposition. In other words, if the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas should be adopted then it would apply to postal employees wherever the President issued an Executive order making it a holiday throughout the United States.

Mr. SISSON. You think his language would be a limitation upon this proviso rather than an enlargement of it?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes. I fear that this proviso as it now stands would be considered to mean, for instance, in the case that I have stated, where half holidays are given in all the departments here in the District of Columbia, to apply to the Federal employees throughout the United States, although it would not apply to the employees of the other departments outside of the District of Columbia. Therefore, it seems to me that as a matter of safety the language suggested by the gentleman from Texas ought to be adopted.

Mr. SISSON. In other words, as this language is drawn, I will ask the gentleman from Texas, a member of the committee, if he does not believe if the President should proclaim a half holiday, beginning in June and ending, as it sometimes does, in October, if September happens to be a hot month, that the very Executive order issued by the President, giving the half holiday within the District of Columbia, would not cause this law to automatically operate and give the half holiday to all the employees throughout the United States?

Mr. BLACK. I will say in reply to that question that that was not the intention of the committee, but I believe the language would be broad enough to be subject to that construction. I do not think that there is any question but that it ought to be amended, as I have suggested, so that the condition could not possibly arise.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman think if the language "the United States" were put in this proviso it would be observed by departments throughout the United States, and that would limit this clause to a proclamation made by the President specifically including the other services of the Government outside of the District of Columbia?

Mr. BLACK. Surely. And it would have to specifically do that before the employees of the Postal Department outside of the District of Columbia could get the benefit of the proclamation.

Mr. SISSON. I think that was the intention of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, on line 14, page 13, I move to amend by adding the following language:

Throughout the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I do not see, construing this section with that added to it, that it does any particular harm. It is something like pasting an a horse's back "This is a horse."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Texas whereabouts in line 14 he wishes the amendment to come in?

Mr. BLACK. At the beginning of line 14, just before the word "shall."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLACK offers the following amendment: At the beginning of line 14, on page 13, insert the words "throughout the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to move an amendment to strike out the language in all of lines 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and up to the word "grade," and including the word "grade," on line 10, page 13. That is the equivalent to the amendment I offered.

Mr. MOON. I think that is satisfactory, in view of the fact that we intend to pass a little later on a provision to take care of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MADDEN moves to amend by striking out, on page 13, beginning with line 5, the following language: "and for the promotion of 85 per cent of the letter carriers in the first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade, and for the promotion of 85 per cent of the letter carriers in second-class post offices from the fourth to the fifth grade, and for the promotion of 15 per cent of the letter carriers in second-class offices from the fifth to the sixth grade."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that the gentleman in moving that amendment intends to have it conform to the recommendation of the committee for an increase of the salaries of all letter carriers and clerks up to class 6, receiving $1,500 a year?

Mr. MADDEN. That is it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire whether it is the policy of the committee to increase the salaries of clerks and carriers in all second-class offices by automatic promotions up to the highest class, and that the clerks and carriers in second-class offices should receive the same salary as those in first-class offices?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. So that there is to be no difference in pay, as heretofore, between the first class and the second class?

Mr. MADDEN. None whatever.

Mr. STAFFORD. Originally, when this classification was first adopted, it was intended that the maximum pay of clerks and carriers in the second class should be one grade below those in the first class?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. This places them on a basis of equality.

Mr. STAFFORD. So that the clerks and carriers in the city of New York or in the city of Chicago, where there is a population of 2,000,000 and more, will receive only the same salary as the carrier and clerk in the city of Sheboygan, Wis.? No; the city of Sheboygan is a first-class office; say, in a city where the population may be only 5,000?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I am going to move to strike out the proviso on page 13, beginning on line 11, down to the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SISSON moves to amend by striking out, on page 13, line 11, all of the proviso.

Mr. SISSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the proviso as amended simply provides that where the President issues a proclamation granting certain holidays to other employees a like holiday shall be granted by this proviso to employees of the Post Office Department. The reasons, of course, may or may not be the same, but if the President should see fit at any time in the future to grant a legal holiday to any particular service of the Government—the customs department or any other department—peculiar reasons might exist why that proclamation might not apply to the Post Office Department, and he might not desire to issue the proclamation with reference to the Post Office Department. But this proviso would automatically give the employees of the Post Office Department that same holiday, whether in the wisdom of the President in issuing the proclamation they would be entitled to it or not.

Not only that, but this becomes rather a bad precedent, it seems to me, in legislation. There is no telling just how much legislation will be engrafted in the other appropriation bills invoking this as a precedent. As the law now is, if the President desires to issue a proclamation granting holidays he can do it. That has been true for many years, and if you are going to leave it to the discretion of the President to grant half holidays or whole holidays on some specific occasion in reference to the other departments of the Government there might be a question as to whether he would or would not issue the proclamation as to the postal employees outside of the District of Columbia. For that reason I think the proviso ought to be stricken out.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield.

Mr. SLOAN. In what case has the President heretofore granted half holidays or holiday to any particular class and not granted it to the whole country?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know of any instance. I will be frank with the gentleman.

Mr. SLOAN. I understand he makes it for the country and not for any particular class of employees or citizens.

Mr. SISSON. Yes. That is why I am opposed to this proviso. I have never known a President in the past to proclaim a holiday throughout the country, on Labor Day or any other day, when he has not made the proclamation to include all the employees alike.

Mr. MOON. But if there is something in the postal laws that makes it impossible to include the postal employees there ought to be compensatory pay or a means to enable the man in the service to get the holiday. The postal employees can not stop for a half or whole holiday. This business must go on, and they do not get the benefit under the postal laws. This subjects them to the rules of the Postal Department and makes them work on a holiday. Now, the President may proclaim a holiday all over the country. It may apply to the Treasury and to the Interior Department and not affect the public business for the employees of those departments to take a holiday or a half holiday; but you can not stop the machinery of the Post Office Department and the mails running through the country, and you can not let the mail carriers off. Yet when a general holiday provided for by a presidential proclamation exists and the postal employees have to work, inasmuch as they can not take the time in view of the postal laws, and are ordered not to do it, they ought to have compensatory time or pay. It is a matter of simple justice.

Mr. SISSON. Take the Fourth of July and Christmas and Labor Day and other days of that kind. All the post offices throughout the country close. The rural carriers all stop. The mails run on the trains, however.

Mr. MOON. The machinery of the post office does not stop. Of course, there may be some instances that occur. But the gentleman does not keep in view the laws of the Post Office Department, by which the Postmaster General or the superior supervisory officer can make these men work, regardless of whether it is a holiday or not, and they ought to have the compensatory time whether they get the holiday or not.

Mr. SISSON. Then this is an indirect method of paying a salary to postal employees when they do not work?

Mr. MOON. No. The gentleman is as muddy as mud can be. [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. I am not muddy at all.

Mr. MOON. That idea does not exist at all. Here is the point: The law permits the Post Office Department to force these employees to work on holidays. If everybody else is getting a holiday, then common justice would say that they ought to have a holiday. But if they can not get the holiday by reason of the exactions of their duties and the orders of the department, and have to go on and work during a holiday when other employees of the Government are getting holidays, they ought to have compensation for that time. That is all there is in this, in my judgment.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing muddy in my mind about this matter. I simply know that the amendment means that if the holidays are granted to other people, and these people work on that holiday, they do get pay for it. But I have never known, except in cases of railway employees, where the holiday is granted that it has not been granted to rural carriers and postmasters throughout the country, and they get pay for it. You do not deduct anything from the postmaster's salary, and you would not deduct anything from the pay of the rural carrier.

Mr. MOON. And he does not get any compensation for it.

Mr. SISSON. He will get double compensation here, because he would get pay for a half holiday whether he works or not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to the fact that the rural carriers have to work on Christmas Day. At one time I offered an amendment, which went out on a point of order, providing that they need not work on Christmas Day.

Mr. MADDEN. All carriers have to work on Christmas Day.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I presume that is true. In my district nearly everybody from the country comes to town on Christmas Day and could as well get their mail in town. But if we accept the amendment offered, the rural carriers will get extra pay if they serve on Sunday or Christmas Day.

Mr. SISSON. In answer to my friend, it is true that they work on Christmas Day, because the business on Christmas Day is heavy, and they have to deliver packages. That day is used by the Post Office Department, and they usually grant them another day off when it is not so busy. That, of course, is to facilitate the Christmas holiday business, which is heavier during that season of the year than at any other time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That may be so, but I still think it is unnecessary to make them work on Christmas Day.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi to strike out the proviso.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For vehicle allowance, the hiring of drivers, the rental of vehicles, and the purchase and exchange and maintenance, including stable and garage facilities, of wagons or automobiles for and the operation of screen-wagon and city delivery and collection services, $9,750,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General may, in his disbursement of this appropriation, apply a part thereof to the leasing of quarters for the housing of Government-owned automobiles at a reasonable annual rental for a term not exceeding 10 years: Provided further, That not to exceed $60,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be immediately available for the erection and equipment of a garage on the site owned by the Government in the rear of the main post-office building in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to call attention to this item which shows the greatest increase of any in the bill. Originally this item was more restricted. It was originally an item which covered horse hire and vehicle allowance, and in the bill of 1916 the language was enlarged so as to cover all the things mentioned in this provision, which reads "vehicle allowance," and so forth. That was when they had a contract system. At that time they changed from a contract system to Government-owned motor vehicles and Government operation. The item at once increased from $2,600,000 to an expenditure of $5,500,000 the next year.

At that time, 1916, 1917, and during 1918, a part of the City Delivery Service was by motor vehicles, it having been enlarged, and included the City Delivery Service. Then a large part of the city transportation was in the tubes in five cities—Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, and New York. That was at an expense of $986,000 per year. They claimed before the commission that was investigating the subject that there was great economy in substituting automobile service for tube service. Now we find that since the Government has owned and operated these vehicles in the City Delivery Service and the screen-wagon service the expenditure has increased from $5,100 to $5,965, $5,964, $6,700,000, and now to $9,750,000.

Now, the committee has never been able to understand where the economy comes in when you have an increase of appropriation at the rate of 20 to 25 or 30 per cent a year. The City Delivery Service takes up some, but the larger part of it was transportation from post offices to depots.

However, it is the same service in the same language that has been covered by appropriations for the last three years. The other branches of the service have not been increased. This appropriation has nearly doubled. It seems to me that this matter ought to be called to the attention of the House.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Is this the first result of the abolition of the pneumatic tube?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; the second result, because when the tube provision was defeated by veto the Post Office Department went to the Senate and got inserted an increase of $735,000. We had passed it, and they increased it over $700,000 after they saw that they were going to succeed in wiping out the tubes. Now we are paying $3,000,000 more than we were paying before.

Mr. TILSON. What did the tubes cost?

Mr. STEENERSON. Nine hundred and seventy-six thousand dollars a year, or thereabouts. They saved that sum, but increased the estimate to $9,750,000.

Mr. TILSON. And the difference the first year was a difference of $3,000,000. A wonderful showing of economy!

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I notice that the gentleman is speaking along the lines of economy and against extravagance. Does he not think that his speech is subject to a point of order in the House on this bill?

Mr. STEENERSON. I know the gentleman from Nebraska is an expert on points of order, and I will leave it to him. I am not raising a point of order, but calling attention to a most wonderful increase in an item which they claimed every year was an attempt in the line of economy. If they keep on economizing like that, I do not know what is going to become of us. One more economy like this and we are lost.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the item ought to be explained. The appropriation last year for this service was $6,700,000, of which $300,000 was to be expended in the fiscal year of 1918, leaving an appropriation for this fiscal year of $6,400,000. The bill now carries $9,750,000, a 50 per cent increase. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] has called attention to the fact that the method of carrying the service has been changed. What was formerly done by contract, in the main, is now done by Government ownership, and we are not informed here whether the increase of 50 per cent is because of increase of service and a decrease in the appropriation of some other item, whether it is partly the result, as undoubtedly it may be, of the increased amount of mail, or whether it is mainly an increase because the Government is doing the work itself. I apprehend it will keep on increasing, because the automobiles that the Government owns will soon have to be replaced, as well as repaired, and I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], who has the information, will inform us why it is.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Of course, personally I know nothing about this item. The estimates of the department are for $9,750,000, an increase of $3,050,000, as the gentleman has stated.

Mr. MANN. An increase of more than that, because $300,000 of the appropriation last year was for the preceding fiscal year.

Mr. MOON. One cause is that the cost of vehicles for mounted carriers has doubled in some instances. I shall read from the hearings:

Where we used to rent motor trucks for seven or eight hundred dollars to-day the price has doubled on account of the increased cost of gasoline and labor. New contracts are to be let next year, and the bids are expected to be much higher. Contracts let last year have to be readjusted, which will result in letting them at a higher rate. Automobiles have advanced 100 per cent.

Then there is a proposition of the building of a garage.

Mr. MANN. Generally automobiles have not advanced 100 per cent.

Mr. MOON. I could not take issue with the gentleman in respect to that. I am reading what the department says about the matter.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. MOON. It is in view of that testimony, and possibly of not getting the service for less, that the committee put that in. It may be that they will not use it all, but we ought to leave some leeway.

Mr. MANN. How much of this work is now being done under contract system and how much by the Government?

Mr. MOON. I do not know. I can not advise the gentleman about that.

Mr. MANN. I should think that would be the first thing that the Post Office would inform the committee about.

Mr. MOON. The department bases it upon the ground that I have stated, that the actual cost of the automobiles and the employment of labor and everything in connection with it is going to be so increased that they ought to have that sum. I think it is possible that we can reduce that amount somewhat, but I give the House the benefit of the hearings.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. When was that information furnished to the chairman, which he just read, about the increased cost of automobiles?

Mr. MOON. Sometime ago. I think it is out of the hearings, on page 21.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, perhaps a partial explanation of the item referred to may be found in the following colloquy that took place in the committee, and I read from page 23 of the hearings:

Mr. MADDEN. This item provides for the expenditure of $9,750,000 for vehicle allowance, the hiring of drivers, rental of vehicles, and the purchase and exchange and maintenance, including stable and garage facilities, of wagons or automobiles for, and the operation of, screen-wagon and city delivery and collection services. What is the comparative cost, under the present method and the contract method, for the wagon service?

Mr. KOONS. So far as the dollars and cents is concerned, Mr. Madden, that is hard to estimate.

Mr. MADDEN. You know what the contract method cost?

Mr. KOONS. Yes; but that is four years ago, and the mail has increased so tremendously since that time.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the percentage of difference in the volume of mail?

Mr. KOONS. The volume of mail has increased more than 100 per cent in many cases.

Mr. MADDEN. The volume of mail has increased more than 100 per cent?

Mr. KOONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. Have the receipts increased 100 per cent?

Mr. KOONS. The receipts would not increase 100 per cent, and it is not necessary that they should for the volume to increase 100 per cent, because the increased volume is in the parcel post, and does not represent a large portion of the receipts.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is an interesting question to find out, and I think the Post Office Department is equipped to make such a statement, and I am going to request that it be furnished the committee; that is, prior to the introduction of Government-owned vehicles, when you had contract-vehicle and screen-wagon service, what the annual cost of such service was in each city and what the aggregate cost was. Will you furnish that?

Mr. KOONS. Yes; we will furnish that.

Mr. MADDEN. And what amount of money has been invested since in Government-owned equipment to supply the contract service which was discontinued, the screen-wagon service that was discontinued, and what the cost of such service, including all items of expenditure, has been; and what is the difference between the cost of the two propositions will be shown.

Mr. Koons then goes on to give some figures, which I shall not undertake to read, and in the note below states:

The annual cost of Government-owned service at Boston, Brooklyn, Buffalo, and New York is based on the average monthly expenditure for that portion of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1918, that Government-owned service was in operation in the cities named. While the statement shows that Government-owned service during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1918, exceeded by $141,867 the cost of contract service, attention is called to the fact that the contract service figures in some instances are based on expenditures made as far back as 1915. Congress by act of July 2, 1918, authorized the Postmaster General to readjust the pay of screen-wagon contractors to cover losses due to unusual conditions resulting from the war, and in making adjustments it has been found that the average increase has been approximately 40 per cent. Applying this increase to the cost of contract service (vehicle charge only) will add $795,006 to the cost of that service, bringing the total expenditures for contract service up to $4,135,315. Deducting the cost of Government-owned service ($3,482,176) from the total for contract service ($4,135,315) shows an annual saving of $653,139 in favor of Government-owned service. Government-owned service besides being more economical than contract service, is also very much more efficient.

Mr. Chairman, I do not undertake to analyze these figures. The figures are here in the record of the hearings, and they probably explain themselves. Whether we have a more economical service or a more expensive service I am not prepared to say. What I want to find out, and which I do not think I found out, was how many more cities we are supplying with Government-owned service than we are supplying with the screen-wagon contract service. We know exactly what it costs to supply a certain number of cities with the screen-wagon contract service. If we have had 10 more cities added for the Government-owned vehicle service, of course it would add whatever the cost of the screen-wagon service in those 10 cities might have been; but it does not appear that we have added any new cities, and a great deal of the $3,000,000 which has been added to the cost of the service appears be due to the readjustment of the contracts due to war conditions, which added 40 per cent to the cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the figure "9" in line 3 and substituting therefor the figure "8."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SLOAN moves to amend, page 14, line 3, by striking out the figure "9" following the dollar mark and inserting in lieu thereof the figure "8."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I do this after listening to what the ranking member on the committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], has said about this matter in his attack upon it and in the defense submitted by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MOON. The what?

Mr. SLOAN. The defense submitted by the chairman of the committee, and I use a rather strained expression, and rather complimentary, when I give it that much dignity, if it may please the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MOON. That is much more than anybody would expect from the gentleman.

Mr. SLOAN. Well, the expectations of the wicked usually perish—as the moon goes down.

Mr. MOON. The moon did not go down in the last election, as I think the Sloan did.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to ask the Chair to take charge of this exuberant Member, who does not ask for recognition before he interrupts. He is quite mistaken; I did not go down in the last election. I desire to say that I offer this amendment after listening to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who is usually very clear on these propositions.

And I think from what he has said and what has been said by others it is clear to all of us this estimate is altogether too high. Especially is this true because there seems to be a lack of explanation and detail upon the part of the department so that it would be difficult for the chairman or any member of the committee successfully to defend the figures presented. If this is reduced $1,000,000 at this time there will be ample opportunity in the next stage of legislation for the Post Office Department, if it has an explanation lucid and sufficient, to bring this before the committee, and this amount can be reinstated in another body. But the strongest fact indicating a lack of basis for this large estimate is that the price of automobiles has doubled. That may be true somewhere, but it is not true in my experience. I had something to do with the purchase of a number of automobiles in the last two years, and I know of no automobile that has doubled in price either wholesale or retail.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I will be pleased to do so.

Mr. AYRES. I do not think that the First Assistant made the statement that the cost of automobiles had doubled. You will find on page 21 that he gives several items which have increased, for instance, gasoline. Now, anyone who has run an automobile for the last two or three years knows that gasoline has very materially increased.

Mr. SLOAN. But he does not know that it has doubled in the last year.

Mr. AYRES. Probably not in the last year, but in the last two or three years.

Mr. SLOAN. But not in the last year, and I understood it is compared with last year's appropriation and not the appropriation of several years ago.

Mr. AYRES. That is true; but you will find several other items on page 21 where the price has increased, and in the case of automobiles——

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman from Kansas indicate one that has doubled in price in all those he speaks about?

Mr. AYRES. No; I do not know that I can, but he does not say it has doubled, but he says it has increased from 40 to 50 per cent.

Mr. SLOAN. That is not as I understood it as read by the chairman, therefore I think this should be reduced $1,000,000.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the very fresh gentleman from Nebraska has suggested that he understands more about this situation than anybody on the committee, and that his views ought to prevail. He possibly may be right about it, he may be wiser than anybody else, he may know about this, and his views perhaps ought to prevail, in view of the fact that the gentleman is perhaps expressing his views on this bill for the last time. That, however, was not a source of any pleasure to me whatever. Now, the committee has to act upon the facts that are before it. It is very clear that the statement of the department is not perhaps as strong as gentlemen might desire it to be, as for the reasons for the large increase in this item, and yet your committee can only guess at that; that is all we can do in making this estimate, to make a reasonable guess from the proof as to what amount of money ought to be appropriated under the conditions that may hereafter exist. Now, it may be that these things will be much higher another year than now, may be they will be less; we do not know. But he says the increase is due to many causes. One is that the cost of vehicles for mounted carriers has doubled in some cases. Well, the gentleman from Nebraska says that is not true. I do not know how he knows that is not true. The department thinks it is true. It has been stated that it is true. I have no reason to take the judgment of the gentleman from Nebraska over that of the department. Why, we used to rent motor trucks for $700 and $800, and to-day the price has doubled on account of the increased cost of gasoline and labor. They do not say it has doubled on account of the actual manufacture of machines, as the gentleman from Nebraska has left the impression, at least upon my mind. Now, contracts are to be let next year, and the bids are expected to be much higher. Contracts let last year are being readjusted, which will result in letting them at a higher rate. Automobiles have advanced 100 per cent. Now, whether those things are true or not I do not know; the gentleman from Nebraska does not know any more about it than I do. He might know more than I do, but he does not know all about it. The department is supposed to have some information on this question; they are the persons charged with the responsibility of administration, and we ought to have some regard for the views that they express. Now, if this money is not necessary, it will not be used. If it is necessary and they do not have it, the department may be crippled in this service. That is all there is to it. Well, we are guessing at this, and they are guessing more or less, and I am not objecting to guessing off a half a million of dollars on this item if you want to, but I do not think it ought to be cut too deep.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. TILSON. What impresses me is the fact that in the year when the war is going on at its height this item seems to have cost $6,000,000, with the high price of automobiles, gasoline, and labor, and all the rest. Now, for the year beginning July 1, 1919, after the war has been over for more than half a year and the new year starts, this item is going to cost $9,700,000. Now what is the reason for the jump of 50 per cent in the year after the war is over?

Mr. MOON. The gentleman just heard the statement of the reasons.

Mr. TILSON. But those reasons are all based on the war, it seems.

Mr. MOON. No; they are not based on the war, but they are based on the market prices. The war has got nothing to do with it.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield for one moment?

Mr. MOON. I am yielding to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. SISSON. I want to say, in answer to what the gentleman says, just what the deficiency is I do not know, but there is a considerable deficiency bill before the Committee on Appropriations in this item. Now, in making calculations for the coming year it will become necessary to take into consideration how much short the six million and odd dollars will be this year.

Mr. TILSON. Is it as much as $3,000,000?

Mr. SISSON. In excess of $6,000,000.

Mr. TILSON. Is the deficiency as much as $3,000,000?

Mr. SISSON. Well, I can not tell the gentleman about that because I only know there is a considerable deficiency asked for by the Post Office Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask for recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman move to strike out the last word?

Mr. SISSON. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. If you reject this item it will simply result in the Post Office Department coming back to Congress with a deficiency bill. In this item there was a readjustment of contract, I understand. Just how much I do not know. But wherever the mail is carried by contract, which contracts were let prior to the war, screen wagon, the cost of carrying the mail was so greatly increased by virtue of the war that many of these contractors were compelled to throw up the contracts and new contracts were let. Therefore I understand, if I am in error the chairman of the committee can correct me, the postal authorities readjusted these contracts and that to some extent accounts for the deficiency asked for. And then the readjustment of other contracts, I understand, will be cared for in this item. Therefore it will be next to impossible to determine just what this item will be. If you cut the item materially it will simply mean the Appropriations Committee will be called upon to make good in a deficiency bill what you fail to appropriate at this time.

Mr. GALLIVAN. What real harm will that do?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know that any real harm would originate, except the Government would be behind in the payment of its contracts.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. SISSON. It might be behind in the payment of some of its obligations.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I rise to inquire what is purposed as to the last proviso in providing for a $60,000 Government garage in the rear of the Government post-office building. Can the gentleman give any idea as to the extent of the building or the character of the construction of this Government garage?

Mr. MOON. I suppose I can answer the gentleman better by just reading from the hearings. They say:

In this appropriation we ask that $60,000 of this amount be made available immediately for the erection and equipment of a garage on the site owned by the Government in the rear of the main post-office building in the District of Columbia. Back of the city post office we have a space sufficiently large for a garage. The nearest point we can get a garage is about a mile or a mile and a half from the office there; the rents are very high, and from the best statistics we can get, or, rather, the best estimates we can get, we can construct a garage for about $60,000, and the interest on that amount would be much less than any rental we would have to pay, and we could save that difference.

Now, that is the statement of the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to the size of the tract of land the Government owns there and the size of the building that is purposed to be erected for use as a garage?

Mr. MOON. I do not know. I think the lot is perhaps 100 feet front. However, it is a small lot. It is not very large. I do not know anything about the construction of the garage or what it will cost. I have read the statement of the department from their estimates, which they furnished to the committee. We did not feel it was necessary to call for details.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can not give any information as to the number of automobiles sought to be accommodated in this garage?

Mr. MOON. I understand there will be a great many. The gentleman can see from the hearings all I know about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not believe there is anything in the hearings on that subject, so far as these details are concerned.

Mr. MOON. The hearings are practically what I have read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I did not get the information that I sought, but I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by railroad routes and aeroplanes, $61,500,000: Provided, That not to exceed $1,000,000 may be expended for payment of freight and incidental charges for the transportation of mails conveyed under special arrangement in freight trains or otherwise: Provided further, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster General is authorized to expend not exceeding $2,185,000 for the purchase of aeroplanes and the operation and maintenance of aeroplane service between such points as may be determined: And provided further, That separate accounts be kept of the amount expended for aeroplane service.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, at the end of line 17, page 15, after the word "service," I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOON offers the following amendment: Insert after the word "service," in line 17, page 15, the following:

"And provided further, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to deliver immediately to the Postmaster General 100 De Haviland 4 aeroplanes, 100 Handley-Pages, 10 Glen Martin day bombers, all planes completely assembled, and with the necessary spare parts. Also 100 extra Liberty engines with spare parts, 50 Hispano-Suiza engines of 300-horsepower motors, and 20 Hispano-Suiza engines with 150-horsepower motors. The same to be out of any equipment that the War Department has on hand or under construction. The War Department appropriation to be credited with the equipment turned over to the Post Office Department."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment just proposed.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment comes from the department. It is one that they desire to have placed in this bill. The reason for it is that Congress passed a law that permitted the War Department to turn over a certain class of aeroplanes in whole or in part that had been used for war purposes to the Post Office Department for use in the Aeroplane Mail Service. I understand that the War Department construes that statute as merely directory, and that it has declined to turn over these planes, owing to some controversy existing between it and another department and a contention which has arisen with that department and the Post Office Department. If you want this aeroplane service to continue, you have got to provide for it in some way. The cheapest and best way will be the use of aeroplanes that we now have and of which the War Department has control. That department does not insist it has any particular use for these planes. It is just a controversy inside the General Staff. The General Staff has assumed its authority and issued its orders. The Post Office Department has got to put in these planes now if it is desired to have the service from New York to Chicago and elsewhere. If we are to have this service, we have got to provide for it. The wisest thing, in my judgment, would be to take the aeroplanes the War Department and the Navy Department may have and use them in the Postal Service. They will not be needed in the war service, and this is practically making mandatory a provision, as to the extent, of course, of the number of planes stated in the amendment, of a law which is held to be directory, and by which the Post Office Department is deprived of its benefits.

Now, I want to say this in reference to that: The committee in making this large recommendation of $1,185,000 anticipated—a part of them at least—a trouble of this sort with the War Department, and they thought it necessary to have an amount of money sufficient to have a reasonable practical experiment of airplanes as mail carriers, and therefore they placed in there the recommendation of the department as $2,185,000. The department did not want to have more than half a million dollars if they could get the use of the airplanes from the War Department and get the benefit of the statute that we heretofore passed on that subject; so that if this amendment is passed I am going to move to reduce the direct appropriation of $2,185,000 to the sum of $500,000.

It is suggested that it might be added to this amendment. If the gentleman from Wisconsin insists on his point of order we can bring in the amendment under the Holman rule, and I hope it will not be objected to.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, I will make a point of order on that paragraph, that portion of it which says "and airplanes, $61,500,000."

Mr. MOON. The point of order, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, would not be well taken without the consent of the House. By the rule of the House adopted in connection with this bill, or rather by unanimous consent, it is provided that every section and paragraph in the bill shall be in order. Of course, any amendment that is germane to any section of the bill is in order.

Mr. CANNON. I was not aware of that unanimous consent. If I had been in the House, I would have reserved a point of order. I think I should have.

Mr. MOON. I think the amendment is germane. If not, it can be made so by providing for a reduction.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman amend his amendment by providing that the War Department furnish these machines and the personnel for their operation and maintenance if the Post Office Department can use them in established lines?

Mr. MOON. Oh, no.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is, you do not want these machines turned over if you can not use them; and, on the other hand, we do not want them turned over if the Post Office Department is not equipped to use them. Why not include a provision for the personnel and the use of the machines?

Mr. MOON. Under the law the personnel would be subject to the Civil Service Commission, and in the next place, we do not want to mix the War Department in any way with the Post Office Department, so far as the carrying of mail is concerned and so far as the administration of the postal function is concerned. The amendment that I have offered does not in any way combine the services of the two departments. It just provides for the handing over by the War Department of certain machinery which belongs to the Government for use in the Postal Service. The War Department is to have credit for it. This is proposed so that we may have the benefits of the proper balancing of accounts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In the event the Post Office Department is not in position to receive these machines and care for them at the present time, does the gentleman still insist that the Post Office Department shall take them over?

Mr. MOON. We are not going to assume anything of the sort. The function of carrying the mails and the airplane function belong to the Post Office Department, and it is best to assume that it can discharge all the duties of transportation of the mails by any means apart from the War Department.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is misinformed as to that. In the event this amendment goes through, will the gentleman consent to strike out this appropriation?

Mr. MOON. I am going to move to amend the appropriation so as to reduce it to $500,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will tell the gentleman that he is getting a lot of white elephants on his hands that he can not care for. That is what it will be. The Post Office Department can not take care of these machines.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. It occurs to me that this is a very large number of airplanes and motors. Has the gentleman any information as to what the value of that aircraft is?

Mr. MOON. I will say to the gentleman that this amendment was sent to me to-day by the Post Office Department, with the request, if possible, to have it put in the bill at this particular point. I have no more information about the matter than other gentlemen.

Mr. BLACK. It strikes me that this will include at least $10,000,000 worth of aircraft.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is in existence. It is there.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I was very much impressed with the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. While I have not had the time to give it careful consideration yet, and while I appreciate the difficulties always involved in two departments engaged in a work to reach one result, still I can see no real reason why the Army can not carry the mail over the routes selected and provided by the Post Office Department, so far as the air service is concerned. We shall undoubtedly maintain in the Army an air service greater or lesser for all time. To give them something actually to do would be to their benefit, would improve the aviation service in the Army, and would prevent duplication in the Post Office Department. If at any time the air service of the Post Office Department reached vast proportions it might not be advisable, then, to have the Army do it. But so long as it is in an experimental condition, and we have the trained men now in the Army—and we propose to continue to train men in the Army—why not give them something to do?

The great trouble with the Army and Navy is in times of peace to find something for them to do. Now, here is an opportunity to take a service that will be continued and not only occupy their time but give them the training which they need to have, without much, if any, additional expense to the Government; whereas if we provide an extra service in the Post Office Department we shall have divided our aviation service so that neither branch will make the same progress that they would make if consolidated in one branch.

Now, the difficulties of having the Army perform the service are not great. The Post Office Department would still control the mail. They would deliver the mail to the airplanes as they now deliver it to the railroad trains. The mail would be carried by the Army as it is now carried by rail or other methods of carriage. I can see no reason why it is not perfectly feasible to do that. And if it be feasible to do it, then certainly no one will dispute that it would be economical to do it. And if it be both feasible and economical, why is it not the proper thing to do?

It may be that it can not be done at this moment on this bill. I do not know. Probably no one is prepared with a proposition that would cover it. But that is a matter that is easily changed and provided for in the future, and if we start in and build up a big aviation service in the Post Office Department there never will be much chance of consolidation in the future, because from some experience and long observation I have discovered, what I think all the rest of us know, that when you propose to change or abolish any branch of the Government you run up against a hard proposition; either the head of the department is opposed to it or the foot where the service rests is opposed to it, one of the two almost invariably. Why not act in a sensible manner. There is not a business concern on earth that would do what is now proposed in the manner proposed in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take issue with anybody in connection with the item and in the consideration of the proposed legislation. I would like to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. There is a point of order now pending against the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not talking about the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is not waiving the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no; but I am not talking about the amendment. My idea was that such information as members of the committee have ought to be disclosed to those present.

I started in to say that I conceived it to be my duty as a member of the committee to make such investigation as I might be able to make for the purpose of familiarizing myself with the possibility, or the desirability, if I may put it in that way, of aeroplane service in connection with the Post Office Department. I went into the matter in some detail. I tried to obtain information as to what the attitude of the War Department had been to the aeroplane service for letter delivery and what the attitude of the Post Office Department had been toward this same service, and how nearly the War Department and the Post Office Department had been able to cooperate—what the outcome of their effort to engage and cooperate had been.

I reached the conclusion that they were not very successful in their attempt to cooperate. In the first place, I concluded from the information I have been able to obtain that the War Department, through some of its officers, decided that it was impossible to operate an aeroplane mail service successfully. On the other hand, the Post Office Department claimed that it was possible and feasible, notwithstanding the statements of officers of the Army, and they proceeded, if I am informed correctly, to demonstrate the ability of the aeroplane service, notwithstanding the condemnation of it by the War Department.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Not until I get through with my statement, and then I will yield if anybody wants to ask a question. Now, I have made some memoranda in regard to this in order that I might not make any misstatement.

In the first place, last March Col. Deeds, who was connected with the Liberty motor and aeroplane construction work during all the period of the war, was a signal officer of the War Department in the aeroplane service. He requested the Postmaster General to permit the Army to operate its mail planes, offering to furnish planes and fliers and to share the expense with the Post Office Department. He said it would harmonize with the Army training program as suggested by Maj. LAGUARDIA. The Post Office Department acceded to the suggestion made by Col. Deeds on condition that the War Department would operate the service daily without break, except on Sunday. This agreement between the signal officer and the Second Assistant Postmaster General was reduced to writing and approved by the Acting Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell. It speedily developed, however, that there was a serious opposition among Army officials directly interested in aviation to the Army conducting the flying for the Post Office Department. An attempt was made at a conference with the post-office officials to induce them to give up military participation in aerial mails. Public announcement had, however, been made of the service and the Post Office Department insisted on the Army carrying out its agreement to the letter to fly daily. Feeling that the Army was not interested in this participation whole-heartedly, the Post Office Department purchased its equipment to take over the work should the military authorities at any time desire to relinquish this cooperation.

The Post Office Department took over the service from the War Department on the 12th of August and operated it with civilian fliers. It made, as far as I have been able to discover, something of a success of the service between here and New York.

Mr. AYRES. The War Department operated it from May 15 up to August 12.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; to August 12. The Post Office Department, as far as I have been able to gather information, made a fairly successful service between Washington and New York. They have demonstrated their ability to fly in all kinds of weather, whether it is raining, foggy, or whether the wind is blowing or not. Yesterday they came over from New York to Washington in an hour and forty minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And killed a man.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know how many men have been killed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Flying in the fog.

Mr. MADDEN. They have killed men in all the services of the Government; it does not make any difference whether it is carrying the mail or carrying bombs, they are killing men. I do not pretend to say that the air service is a safe service. What I pretend to say is that the Army is putting every obstacle in the way of the service that they can. I am opposed to turning over the service to the Army, where they refuse to operate it. They now think the service is likely to become practicable, because it has been fairly demonstrated that it can be done, and as soon as they find it can be done they want to take it back. We turned the mail over to them for delivery of letters on the other side, and we know what kind of service they gave to us and our soldiers. Thousands and thousands of letters were never delivered, and it was under the conduct of the Army over there. Who is to blame for that I do not pretend to say. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I was about to ask the gentleman if he thought the position of the Army was based on their knowledge of the fact that it could not succeed?

Mr. MADDEN. That is what they said.

Mr. SNYDER. Or whether it was because they wanted to act in opposition to the Post Office Department?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In just a moment. They have succeeded so far in flying 80,000 miles since the 12th of August with cilivian fliers. They have made 111 days from August 12 up to the present time, and up to December 1 only seven forced landings had been made. Only two trips were lost on account of weather conditions and only three trips were interfered with requiring the placing of the mail on the train through failure of motor. In a flying program exceeding 80,000 miles there has not been a single casualty, except one or two minor casualties, until yesterday.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman does not make that statement for a fact, does he?

Mr. MADDEN. What does the gentleman know about it?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When the Post Office Department thought they could run aeroplanes the same as they did their automobiles, they found out they could not, for they killed three men in a fog and they killed one yesterday.

They killed three men in a fog a few weeks ago.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. In the gentleman's memorandum does he tell us how many machines have been actually used up in making the 80,000 miles?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield for a question in the five minutes?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, surely; I will yield at any time. The estimate of the Post Office Department for $300,000 was submitted to the committee for this experimental service, but the Postmaster General and his assistants indicate that in order to carry the service on successfully for a year it will cost about $3,000,000.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Is it not a fact that if the War Department turns over to the Post Office Department 100 De Haviland planes, 100 Handley-Paige, 10 Glen Curtiss planes, 100 extra Liberty engines, and 70 Hispano-Suiza planes, would that not be at least $5,000,000 worth of aircraft?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know what the value would be.

Mr. BLACK. And does the gentleman think we ought to go into the service that strong?

Mr. MADDEN. What I think is that we ought to experiment properly. I do not pretend to say that we are ready to make complete air service mail delivery all over the United States, but I do pretend to say that you can run aeroplanes across the continent in 250-mile relays successfully, just as well as you can run between here and New York successfully. There is no reason why you should attempt to run the entire stretch of the continent without stopping and changing planes. There ought to be periods, stations where you can stop and change, just like the railroads change engines at the different division headquarters.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chariman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Has the gentleman any figures there giving the cost of the service in these 80,000 miles run and the number of machines used?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It costs $5.95 a pound.

Mr. MADDEN. We charge 6 cents an ounce for mail.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I mean the cost to the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. The cost to the Government so far has been in excess of the receipts, but if the planes were to carry what we are told they should carry, and what they are qualified to carry, they would be run on a profitable basis, on the basis of a charge of 6 cents an ounce.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. About how much mileage have we been able to get out of a new machine in this service?

Mr. MADDEN. I really could not tell the gentleman that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman know how many machines we have used.

Mr. MADDEN. I will tell the gentleman that in a moment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Just in a moment. Let me say something myself.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You have been saying it for 15 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not speak in that way to the gentleman when he had the floor, and I do not see any reason why he should be impertinent to me now.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not mean to be impertinent. I want to give the gentleman some information.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman can not be impertinent to me, and I want him to understand it. Col. Goodyear, in charge of flying operations under Col. Deeds, came up with Col. Bloomfield, the English flying officer here, and he said you could not operate planes between here and New York. The fact that they have been operated successfully between here and New York proves that Col. Deeds and Col. Goodyear and Col. Bloomfield were mistaken.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In just a moment. Let me get through with this first. We are operating between New York and Washington 10 planes, one round trip each week day, rain or shine, and the average time between here and New York is 2 hours and 20 minutes, while the average time between New York and Washington is 2 hours and 45 minutes. The reason for the difference in time is on account of the way the winds prevail. You are running against the wind in one case and with the wind in the other. There are 16 aeroplanes between Chicago and Washington that are proposed to be started in that service. They say it is feasible to make that trip in 10 hours, beginning at 6 o'clock in the morning and landing at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and a machine came over here from New York yesterday in an hour and 40 minutes, came through zero weather, through a sleet storm part of the way, stopped 10 minutes at Philadelphia, and it was 10 degrees below zero part of the way over.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two minutes, as I would like to get some information.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman conclude. I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, the Navy is wiring the machines for the Post Office Department. It already has and it is putting in radio apparatus, so that they can telephone and keep in communication, and also have radio range finders, so that a man can not get off the course in the rain or fog, and the Bureau of Standards is projecting a magnetic induction set which will enable a man who flies a machine to reach the center of the field, no matter what the weather is, what the hour of the day is, how dark the night may be or how foggy it may be, and with these perfected instruments it seems to me that notwithstanding what the Army says we are making progress, and that we are making this progress with civilian fliers, men who are willing to go, men who are not saying they can not go, and that is what Col. Deeds said and that is what Col. Goodyear said and that is what Bloomfield said. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If the gentleman has finished his statement, I was trying to find out if the gentleman knew how many planes we had used in this service up to date.

Mr. MADDEN. Twenty-six.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Are they all being used yet, does the gentleman know?

Mr. MADDEN. They are all being used yet.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman aware that from May 15 to May 31 the cost of running 10 machines by the Post Office Department was $32.54 an hour and 50 cents a mile?

Mr. MADDEN. I expected it would be at least $25 an hour. That was when it was run by the Army.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. From the statement of the Postmaster General. Now, the gentleman makes the statement that they have machinery and the appliances and improvements by which a machine can fly at night, regardless of weather conditions, in a fog, or any kind of weather?

Mr. MADDEN. I did not say we have them; I said they were being equipped.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is exactly it. Is the gentleman aware that it is going to cost millions of dollars to equip and install?

Mr. MADDEN. It will not cost millions of dollars to equip 25 or 30 of these.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If you are going to install radio control in machines, do you know you have to string along the wires, whether you have 100 or 1 machine?

Mr. MADDEN. We are experimenting on these, and I think it is worth while to make the experiment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. But is it not better to have one experiment for all departments of the United States Government?

Mr. MADDEN. We may in the end come to turn all the departments into one, but I do not believe that it is feasible or practicable or wise to turn the mail service over to the Army.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the only objection the gentleman has?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. MANN. I understood my colleague to say that the present postage was 6 cents an ounce?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is that the same as it was when it was started or is it a reduction?

Mr. MADDEN. I think it was 24 cents.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; it was 15 cents an ounce for the first few months.

Mr. MANN. There is no law——

Mr. TILSON. I think the gentleman is mistaken. When it first started it was 24 cents for each letter.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is, and that is the reason I asked the question, that there was a statement in the papers some time ago that the postage had been reduced because the department could now afford to carry the mail for the reduced amount.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I do not pretend to say what the cost is. I am only saying I think the experiment is justified. I do not think we ought to expend too large a sum in experimentation, but I think we ought to give the department an opportunity to prove the feasibility. Now, it seems to me that they have made a good deal better proof of its feasibility than the Army succeeded in making. They are for it and the other people were against it.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman think as a practical man that we ought to utilize the resources that we already have at hand?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. TILSON. And if we have a certain number of planes complete; I do not know just how many——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It seems to me that we ought to proceed on business principles, so far as we can, even though airplane mail service may be in the experimental stage.

Two years ago in the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill I moved an amendment making appropriation for experimental post-office delivery of mail by airplane. It was ruled out on a point of order. We had no airplanes in the Postal Service and none of account in the military service at that time. Since that time a great deal of water has run over the dam. We now have not only a number of airplanes complete, but have a much larger number in process of construction. In addition to that we have what we did not have then—a considerable number of trained fliers.

It seems to me that what we ought to do is to utilize our resources in both personnel and matériel. It would be bad business for the Post Office Department to start anew, on its own hook, and buy airplanes when we already have a department of the Government with a considerable number of airplanes and with enough trained fliers to use them. For the military flier this would be the best possible practice and at the same time perform a very useful governmental work. I see no insuperable objection to the two departments of the same Government, under the same Chief Executive, working in cooperation. If they do not work in harmony voluntarily, they might be compelled to work in cooperation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think I can see one very great objection, namely, that those who are in the military service are absolutely subject to military orders. And so far as your trained personnel is concerned, you will have a very large number who have been trained in the Army and undoubtedly will go out into civil life, and who unquestionably would be very glad to take charge of the service in the Post Office Department. Is not that a fair statement?

Mr. TILSON. Assuming that we could secure in civilian employment a number of men who had been thus trained in military flying, we should have utilized part of your personnel resources. Now, what as to the matériel? What as to the planes themselves?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think unquestionably that the planes should be transferred from the War Department to the Post Office Department, in accordance with the provisions of this amendment. Whether this provides for too many or not, of course I am not prepared to say, but if they are not going to be of service in the War Department, why, most assuredly they ought not to be wasted.

Mr. TILSON. What is the gentleman going to say as to continuing the training of the men, the fliers, as a matter of national defense, as a necessary part of our military training? That must be kept up at whatever cost. Shall we have a large corps flying for training purposes without carrying anything and at the same time have alongside of it another flying corps in the Post Office Department carrying the mail? Why not combine the two?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. To my mind it is an all-sufficient reason that those who are in the Army will be subject to military orders at all times.

Mr. TILSON. That is no objection at all.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And being so subject to military orders at all times, I do not believe that they will be properly fitted to go into civilian employment.

Mr. TILSON. They are officers of the very same Government, and, whether they are under the Post Office control or the military control, they are subject to the orders of the same Chief Executive. In my judgment we shall make a great mistake if we do not maintain the air service in a state of efficiency as a part of our military program, and it will help rather than hinder to utilize it in carrying the mail.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. Suppose the Army was operating the railroads of this country, would it be thought they could not carry the mail successfully?

Mr. TILSON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two additional minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this close in five minutes.

Mr. TILSON. I object.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MOON. I do not want to cut off anybody.

Mr. STEENERSON. The chairman of the committee ought to yield five minutes to me.

The CHAIRMAN. That is another matter.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to cut off my friend from Minnesota or anybody else who wants to talk on this amendment. Here is a general debate going on on the whole subject that may be interminable. Now, I want to move to limit the debate. The debate under the rules has already been exhausted long ago, and I ask unanimous consent——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will also state that there is a point of order pending.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the amendment that I want to offer.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate close in 40 minutes, to be divided by the Chair among the gentlemen who have applied for it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BLACK. I want to submit an inquiry. I would like to know if that motion would interfere with my offering a motion to amend the amendment?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, there has a point of order been made on this amendment, and I believe, before we indulge in this 40 minutes of debate, we ought to dispose of it, because if the point of order is well taken there will be no use for the debate.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have an amendment that will probably raise the same question in a different way.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin wish to argue his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. Most assuredly.

Mr. MOON. State your grounds. If it is subject to a point of order we will save a good deal of time by not carrying on the debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order that the amendment proposed is not germane to any legislation carried in the bill, and it violates the rule of the House prohibiting legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the subject that we have under discussion is inland transportation of mails. That is provided for, of course, by law. Here is an appropriation limiting the amount of transportation in the airplane line and in the inland transportation line to a fixed sum. The amendment now proposed is simply this: It is to provide a means—an additional means—of transportation. The statute authorizes the transportation of inland mails. It does not designate the different methods by which it can be done, and it is within the meaning of the statute and the province of the House under its rules to add, I take it, any means of transportation to the mail facilities that we now have on an appropriation bill or anywhere else with proper limitations.

Now, I have said to the gentleman that if there is any point on the question of the limitation I would be glad to amend the section hereafter and bring it under the Holman rule if possible. But I insist that the amendment is in order now. It is germane to the existing statute, which provides for inland transportation of mails. We have got a right, unquestionably, to combine, under the practice of the House, on an appropriation bill or anywhere else, all of the instrumentalities of transportation that are permitted under the law, and they are all permitted. I do not think, then, that it would be very farfetched or a close construction of the statute to admit the amendment which the department has asked for in this bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will be heard first.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Excuse me.

Mr. MOON. I want to say that every paragraph of this bill has, by unanimous consent, been made in order, and the only question here is whether this amendment is germane to the matter that is now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as the chairman of the committee has just stated to the Chair, there was an order agreed to in the House that all the legislation carried in this appropriation bill would be considered in order. The question before the Chair now is whether this item, being presented on an appropriation bill and a point of order having been waived, the amendment now proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee would have been in order. He advances that as his major premise for holding the amendment to be in order, and also the fact that provision has been made for the establishment of airplane service.

There is no authority for the establishment of airplane service by law other than which is carried in the appropriation act, which merely provides in general language as follows:

> For inland transportation by steamboat or other power-boat routes or by airplane.

That is the extent of the present language authorizing the establishment of airplane service. Now, I direct the attention of the Chair——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MOON. The agreement of the House by unanimous consent makes this airplane legislation in order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have already stated that. If the gentleman heard my opening remarks, he will remember that I stated that to be the position of the gentleman as the basis for his argument that it is in order.

Mr. MOON. Why is it, then, not in order?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because it is not germane. If the gentleman will hold himself in patience, I will try to demonstrate that it is not germane.

Mr. MOON. Very well.

Mr. STAFFORD. There was authorization in the last appropriation act covering this airplane service. It is found in section 8. This amendment that is now proposed, Mr. Chairman, seeks to change the existing law covering this question as found in section 8 of the present Post Office appropriation act. May I read section 8? It reads as follows:

> That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, deliver and turn over to the Postmaster General from time to time, and without charge therefor, for use in the Postal Service, such aeroplanes and automobiles or parts thereof as may be, prove to be, or as shall become, unsuitable for the purposes of the War Department but suitable for the use of the Postal Service; and the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to use the same, in his discretion, in the transportation of the mails and to pay the necessary expenses thereof out of the appropriation for inland transportation by steamboat or other power boat or by airplanes or star route.

He is seeking by this amendment to direct and take out of the power of the Secretary of War—which is existing law—the discretion which is now lodged in the Secretary of War, to turn over a certain number of airplanes of different types and a certain number of engines. Certainly on this appropriation bill he can not add that character of legislation, and the mere fact that there was an order entered making in order the legislation that was carried in this bill would not go to the extent of making in order a distinct, substantive proposition of law changing existing law unless it is germane to the matter that is contained in the existing appropriation bill.

And that is what we are brought to in the last analysis, whether it is germane to this paragraph; whether a direction, a mandatory direction, to the Secretary of War to turn over a certain number of airplanes and motors is germane to the authorization as carried in this bill providing for the expenditure of not exceeding $2,000,000 for the purchase of airplanes and the operation and maintenance of airplane service between such points as may be determined. I may be in error in the position I am now presenting, but I respectfully submit in all candor that in determining whether it is germane I believe the Chair should consider the question as if this were a separate bill, and it provided merely for the purchase of airplanes, whether it would be germane to direct the Secretary of War to turn over supplies under his control. But even if you would hold that it would be germane under those circumstances, you could not escape the ruling that no legislation shall be in order on an appropriation bill, although we have made an order that everything that is covered in this bill shall be in order. That does not signify that it wipes away the general rules of the House——

Mr. MOON. That is just what it does——

Mr. STAFFORD. That other legislation can be carried on an appropriation bill.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the law authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over airplanes to the Post Office Department was carried as a rider in last year's appropriation bill, and is not included in this bill? It is a separate, independent law of last year.

Mr. STAFFORD. I may have been in the realm of fancy, but I thought that a few minutes ago I read the very section in last year's appropriation bill that grants that authority.

Mr. STEENERSON. I was not listening.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the very purpose of obtaining unanimous consent was to make each and every item, section, and paragraph in the bill in order, so as to avoid the rule that there could not be new legislation on an appropriation bill. The House made in order this section providing that out of the appropriation the Postmaster General is authorized to expend not exceeding $2,185,000 for the purpose of aeroplanes and the operation and maintenance of aeroplane service between such points as he may determine.

Now, there is a provision in reference to utilizing aeroplanes for mail service and provides for the appropriation of money for that purpose. That is all in order. Why is it that the proposition to authorize the purchase from another department, that department to be credited with them, is not in order to this section which is in order? That is all I desire to say about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman contend that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has the authority to control the supplies of the War Department?

Mr. MOON. No; but the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is proposing under this act, which provides for the payment of them, to pay for them by crediting them to the War Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's committee would not have authority to control the supplies of the War Department, and how can an individual on the floor have a greater authority under the rules of the House?

Mr. MOON. I do not appreciate the point the gentleman makes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has admitted that the committee has no authority to report a bill covering supplies legitimately in the possession of the War Department. The gentleman individually now seeks to introduce a bill or amendment on the floor of the House carrying that very subject which his committee would not have authority to act upon. How can an individual Member on the floor of the House have a greater authority than his committee would have?

Mr. MOON. We are simply proposing to carry out the provision of the section that is made in order notwithstanding the general rules of the House.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard briefly on the point of order. The question of germaneness ought to depend on the prime and principal object of the amendment and not upon something incidentally connected with it. The principal purpose of this amendment is to take the property of one department and turn it over to another department. Incidentally it might enable the other department to carry on something provided for in the bill, although it does not modify or change any section in the bill. Let us see where we would land if we adopted that rule that because the matter proposed incidentally affected in some way the aeroplane provision the amendment might be germane.

If this amendment is germane, an amendment turning over to the Post Office Department the aeroplane fields would be germane. Perhaps the paragraph does not go far enough; but under the same theory we might have an amendment turning over from the Navy Department to the Post Office Department the ships of war to carry the mails. We might have a similar amendment taking from the War Department some of its automobiles and turning them over for mail wagons. If an amendment can be made germane under that principle, it is easy to make any kind of an amendment germane. The real purpose of this amendment and its only effect is to transfer property from the War Department to the Post Office Department. The fact that such property could be used for postal purposes does not make the provision germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The facts in this case are as follows. The paragraph proposed to be amended, beginning with line 7, provides an appropriation of $61,500,000 for inland transportation by railroad route and aeroplane. This is an appropriation pure and simple. Then follow certain provisions which are limitations. In line 11 is a provision that empowers the Postmaster General to expend not to exceed $2,185,000 for the purchase of aeroplanes, and the operation and maintenance of the aeroplane service, between such points as he may determine. This sentence affords authority to the Postmaster General to do certain specified things.

It was agreed by unanimous consent that everything in this bill should be in order, the rules of the House to the contrary notwithstanding. But it can hardly be contended that this agreement makes in order everything proposed to be added to the bill, and that is the crux of the contention that the amendment under consideration is in order.

The effect of this amendment is to direct the War Department to turn over certain property to the Post Office Department. That direction changes the discretion of the War Department, in fact it leaves it no discretion whatever in this particular. The amendment commands the War Department to do certain specific things which otherwise it would not be required or empowered to do. In a word the amendment in this respect controls the activities of that department. It does not control or relate to the discretion of the Post Office Department, but operates to provide that department with certain material. Such a provision is certainly new law. In connection with the contention that this amendment is in order because the matter in the bill is in order, the Chair will call attention to the rulings to the effect that when an item is made in order in a bill, by a rule or otherwise, such action does not authorize new illegalities or allow matter to be inserted that would not be in order, unless it was a perfecting germane amendment.

To direct the War Department to turn over these aeroplanes to the Post Office Department is not a development of the authority of the Post Office Department to purchase operate and maintain aeroplanes. It enlarges the powers of the War Department. Having in mind that the War Department has shops to repair and keep in order its planes, would an amendment be in order to direct the War Department to keep in proper condition the planes which it is directed to deliver to the Post Office Department? Yet that amendment would stand on the same footing as the one under consideration. This is a proposition of new legislation relating to another department, and the Chair does not think that it is perfecting by way of amendment the matter made in order in the bill, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOON. I did not quite understand; did the Chair sustain the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOON. I would not be surprised if the Chair is right about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which is at the desk, which I ask to have reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: Page 15, line 11, strike out all after the word "otherwise" down to and including line 17.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment strikes out the proviso on page 15 that relates to the authorization to the Postmaster General to expend $2,185,000 for the purchase of aeroplanes and the operation and maintenance of aeroplane service between such points as may be determined. Under the act that we passed on the 2d of July, 1918, we provided that the Secretary of War should turn over, in his discretion, to the Post Office Department, and deliver to the Postmaster General from time to time, such aeroplanes for use in the Postal Service and automobiles and parts thereof as shall become unsuitable for war purposes, but suitable for the use of the Postal Service. That is paragraph 8 of the act of July 2, 1918. The war is over, and the whole aeroplane equipment will become useless for the purposes of war. I visited the Department of Aeronautics of the Government this morning to find out what aeroplanes we have that are available for this service, and I was informed down there by one of the officers in charge that we have three classes of aeroplanes set up in the hangars or at the ports or boxed up ready for shipment, but complete, that are available for use in the air-mail service. First, we have about 1,500 75-mile speed machines designated as JN-4 D, equipped with the Curtiss engines, that could be used; second, we have about 1,000 JN-4 H machines of 180 horsepower that develop a speed of 105 miles per hour that are available for this purpose; third, we have about 1,000 machines equipped with the Hispano-Suiza engines, known as the De Haviland-4 machine, which are equipped with 400-horsepower Liberty 12-cylinder engines, that are available for this use. Yet with all that equipment we now propose to authorize the Postmaster General to purchase and expend in buying aeroplanes the sum of $2,185,000, and on page 53 of the hearings it is stated "that the Postmaster General's program will require between three and four million dollars."

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. If I can get more time. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. AYERS. The gentleman has stated what the law provides, that the War Department shall turn these aeroplanes over, but it is within the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is true, and I also said in my opening remarks that the discretion of the War Department would be exercised against parting with this equipment during war, but the war is over, and there is no use of this equipment now for war purposes.

Mr. AYRES. Does the gentleman know that they have refused to-day to turn it over?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not know it.

Mr. AYRES. That is a fact.

Mr. ROBBINS. I say if they have, then I should favor an amendment to this bill, if this amendment is voted down, reenacting the eighth clause of the act of July 2, 1918, striking out the words "in his discretion" and insert the words "shall such aeroplanes," and so forth, and making it mandatory.

Mr. AYRES. But that would be subject to a point of order, which has just been ruled upon.

Mr. ROBBINS. The clause just ruled out would not apply to this, because it does not change existing law. We have all of this equipment, and if there is any equipment that will go out of order by storage and nonuse very quickly it is aeroplane equipment. It is just like any other new machine. Constant improvements are being made upon them, and the thing to do is to use up this equipment now while we can use it, without any additional expense to the Government in this mail service. We have a trained body of aeroplane operators, and where are they? They are in the Army, developed there by operating aeroplanes in the Army. They are not in civil life. Another set of them is in the biplane or hydroplane service of the Navy, and we propose to establish a service with Cuba and Porto Rico and we will have to get those naval machines known as "hydroplanes," having boats suspended under the aeroplane, so why develop three branches of the service when the Post Office Department could get all the necessary machines from the War Department, using the equipment we have, taking over the trained men in the War Department already prepared by education, training, and experience to carry on this work of transporting the mail by airplanes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Why did the gentleman want to strike out the appropriation, if he now talks about using it in connection with the War Department, when there is no authority to have any connection with the War Department?

Mr. ROBBINS. If we do not have the authority we can easily provide it, and by striking out this proviso we are merely stopping the Postmaster General from buying a lot of aeroplanes when the War Department has 3,000 that could be obtained free by the Post Office Department.

Mr. MOON. You are stopping the whole service.

Mr. ROBBINS. When we already have aeroplanes. If you are going to carry this service on in the Post Office Department let us take the equipment we now have on hand, that will not cost us a cent, that is going to rust and wreck and ruin, because the hangars are very poor places to protect property of that sort. They are made of linen and silk and fragile wood, and the machines rust and corrode very quickly.

Mr. MOON. But we can not get them. We would be very glad to have them.

Mr. ROBBINS. This Congress can not get them? I will tell the chairman of the committee why we can not get anything: It is because we submit here like a supine lot of Members and allow these departments of the Government to run the whole Nation and to run Congress also. Does this legislation not mean anything? If it does, let us have it carried into effect.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman may apply that characterization to himself or anyone else, but not to this side.

Mr. ROBBINS. You gentlemen have been running the Government for some time, and I think that has been going on on both sides of this House. I do not criticize the majority side or the gentleman, but I say that we pass legislation here day after day and the departments ignore it, and we all know that, and it is time now to see to it that our legislation is obeyed.

The United States Government has on hand between two and five thousand airplane machines, either in actual use of packed ready for shipment, all of which could be put in use in a very short time. The carrying power of these machines varies from 100 pounds to the De Havilland, which carries approximately 500 pounds. The United States has contracts for a large number of machines that are yet being built or partially built, so that when the present air service is closed out, the United States will have on hand probably somewhere between five and ten thousand of several kinds of airplanes ready for service, and practically all of these could be used for mail service.

The proper way to install this service is not by establishing an expensive special bureau in the Post Office Department, which has already been started by the appointment of a superintendent of air-mail service with a corps of assistants, all of which is useless expense and a waste of money. The proper way to carry the mail by air is to turn the whole matter of transportation over to the Army.

It is now admitted that aeronautics has become an absolutely necessary part of modern warfare, and the airplane is now regarded as the "eyes of the Army."

It is, therefore, necessary that both the Army and Navy keep up its organization and constantly train men for this service. These men would have nothing to do, except simply to train and make practice flights. If, on the other hand, they were carrying the mail, we would be constantly developing a corps of experts, who would be experienced by flights in the air, and also a trained and experienced corps of mechanicians and mechanics, who would observe the airplanes as they operated and develop the experience necessary to meet conditions as they arise.

All this service would be conducted without any additional cost whatever, because the War Department must maintain this service, and while taking the necessary military training, the mails would be transported free of cost by the Army experts and fliers in the Army machines. This service could also be extended across the water by using the Navy biplanes for the same service, without any cost to the Post Office Department.

Moreover, it does not require a very far look into the future to discover that airplanes are going to be used for private business and pleasure. If each town with a population of 10,000 was required to purchase and maintain landing places for airplanes—because it must be remembered that no service in the air can be carried on without landings—then at each of these landing places the Army could maintain a service station and two men who would not only look after the Government machines but would train enthusiastic private citizens who desire to acquire a knowledge of airplanes and also train men for business service in the art of flying and caring for airplanes.

The appropriation in this bill amounting to over $2,000,000 is nothing but pure waste of the people's money, which can not be justified on any reasonable ground. It is simply an attempt to establish another bureau in the Post Office Department, fill it up with useless appointees and high-salaried officials, and squander millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money at a time when economy should be the rule in Congress; and any who vote for this appropriation vote, in my judgment, in favor of simply wasting that amount of the taxes of the people. This mail can be carried more efficiently by the Army airplanes on land than it can by the Post Office Department and without any extra cost whatever to the Government and to the taxpayers.

Before the war the mails were transported by the railroads by simply turning over to the railroads at their termini and received from them at their destination, and it was efficiently carried. The mails to be carried by airplanes should be delivered to the military airplanes at the point of origin and taken from the military airplanes at the point of destination in the same way. Any other course is wasteful and extravagant.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

By unanimous consent Mr. ROBBINS was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. STEENERSON. I move to strike out the last seven words of line 16 and the first five words of line 17, page 15, and insert in lieu thereof "that the Postmaster General shall keep an account"——

Mr. MANN. I think we had better dispose of the present amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offered an amendment to strike out part of the bill. As the Chair understood the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, it was to perfect the text; if so, that will be voted on before the motion to strike out.

Mr. ROBBINS. I did not understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the way the Chair understood the motion.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is to perfect the text of the section?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the way the Chair caught it. The gentleman from Minnesota will state his amendment again.

Mr. STEENERSON. Strike out the last seven words of line 16 and the first five words of line 17 and in lieu thereof insert the following on page 15, line 16: "that separate accounts shall be kept of the amount of extra postage received for aeroplane service and the amount of expenditures."

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman has the amendment in writing, send it up.

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I have not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to ask the gentleman to repeat the amendment; the Clerk can not get it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Strike out the last seven words of line 16 and the first five words of line 17 and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "that separate accounts shall be kept of the amount of extra postage received for aeroplane service."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, that is a good amendment, and I have no objection to its adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 16, after the word "further" strike out the following: "that separate accounts be kept of the amount expended for aeroplane service" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "that the Postmaster General shall keep a separate account of the amount of extra postage received for aeroplane service."

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman from Minnesota offer his amendment to follow the provision in the bill and instead of striking out the provision for keeping a separate account of expenditures let that stay in?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am willing to accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois and simply amend by adding to the last word in line 17 the following.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment. After the word "service" in line 17, strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "and keep a separate account of the amount of extra postage received for aeroplane service."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has an amendment pending to strike out the section.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have a substitute for his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 13, after the word "exceeding" strike out "$2,185,000 for the purchase of aeroplanes and" and insert in lieu thereof "300,000 for."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I hope the chairman of the committee will accept this amendment. This will enable the Postmaster General to operate the planes which he now has and continue the service which he originally planned to commence under the 1918 and 1919 program. That is all the Post Office Department asked for. I am in full sympathy with the chairman in reference to the attitude of the War Department. Now, the attitude of this House is to compel the War Department to cooperate with the Post Office Department. Their appropriation bill will be here in a few days and that is an opportunity which we will take to arrange their appropriation so that the air service may conduct this postal-air service. I spoke this morning and endeavored to show that we can conduct the mail service without the expenditure of an additional cent. With my amendment we are giving the Postmaster General all he asks for. He can carry out his plans as submitted to the committee and we have plenty of time to change the law and make it mandatory upon the Secretary of War to cooperate and turn over machines and personnel. I urge the acceptance of my amendment.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, it would appear upon the face, even of the hearings, that an addition of $300,000 was as much as the Postmaster General wanted, but, going to the report, you find an entirely different thing. That is due to the fact that the question of aeroplane service was transferred from the steamboat and aeroplane service to the inland transportation service and made a part of it, and the amount of $61,000,000 was appropriated. If it had been left as it was the Postmaster General could have used $10,000,000, if he wanted to, on these combined services.

A MEMBER. Or all of it.

Mr. MOON. Or all of it, if he saw fit, but the committee realized that he wanted three or four millions more for that purpose and wanted to prevent him from using any more than the amount, so we fixed the amount at $2,155,000. Now, if we could get the aeroplanes we ought to have from the department, if that controversy did not exist which will not be settled until we have made a mandatory law on the subject, we might get along, perhaps, with $500,000 for the operation and preparation of these planes. Perhaps we would not want all that, but we need a great many of them. As this was in the original language, it would have given the Postmaster General the right to use any part of it he saw fit and——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I understood the gentleman correctly—I am not sure I did—if the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out this proviso is sustained, the Postmaster General could use as much as he chooses?

Mr. MOON. He would get nothing then, not a cent.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MOON. If we strike it out, he will not get a cent, because we do not provide in this section for anything but $2,185,000.

Now, it might be construed, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa—and I would not undertake to say as a matter of law how that was now—that if that limitation was stricken out and we still leave the aeroplane service linked up with the inland transportation, that he might use all of it that he wanted to.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is exactly what the Postmaster General wanted.

Mr. MOON. To make that certain we put the limitation in there.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There has been a great deal said here about the impossibility of making one department help another, and it is said, for instance, that the War Department and the Navy Department can not help the Post Office Department. I desire to point to a precedent.

In the year 1847 a great many of our people had gone to Oregon, and it was desirable to establish a mail service to connect, through Panama and the Chagres River, with Oregon and the west coast, and thereupon the act of March 2, 1847, which I find in the Twenty-ninth Congress, chapter 62, provided in section 4 that the Secretary of the Navy should make the mail contracts—

That from and immediately after the passage of this act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to contract, on the part of the Government of the United States, with A. G. Sloo, of Cincinnati, for the transportation of the United States mail from New York to New Orleans, twice a month and back, touching at Charleston (if practicable), Savannah, and Habana; and from Habana to Chagres and back, twice a month.

Now, how was he to do it? By ships constructed under direction of the Navy Department—

The said mail to be transported in at least five steamships of not less than 1,500 tons burden, and propelled by engines of not less than 1,000 horsepower each, to be constructed under the superintendence and direction of a naval constructor in the employ of the Navy Department, and to be so constructed as to render them convertible at the least possible expense into war steamers of the first class.

So the Secretary of the Navy was to direct the construction of these steamers, as he ought now of the aeroplanes. And it goes on that the ships should be under naval officers—

And that the said steamships shall be commanded by officers of the United States Navy not below the grade of lieutenant, who shall be selected by the contractor, with the approval and consent of the Secretary of the Navy, and who shall be suitably accommodated without charge to the Government.

And not only that, but—

Each of said steamers shall receive on board four passed midshipmen of the United States Navy, who shall serve as watch officers, and be suitably accommodated without charge to the Government; and each of the said steamers shall also receive on board and accommodate, without charge to the Government, one agent, to be appointed by the Postmaster General, who shall have charge of the mails to be transported in said steamers.

Then, after providing for a limit of cost—

That the compensation for said service shall not exceed the sum of $290,000, and that good and sufficient security be required for the faithful fulfillment of the stipulations of the contract.

Section 6 provides that the vessels shall be under naval control:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to provide, in the contracts authorized by this act, that the Navy Department shall at all times exercise control over said steamships, and at any time have the right to take them for the exclusive use and service of the United States, and to direct such changes in their machinery and internal arrangements as the Secretary of the Navy may require; due provision being made in the said contracts for the mode of ascertaining the proper compensation to the contractors therefor.

Under that act, Mr. Chairman, for years the mails to the Pacific coast were carried for the Postmaster General under contract made by the Secretary of the Navy and appropriations in the naval appropriation bill, in ships constructed under his direction by naval constructors, and in ships commanded by naval officers. In the opening of the Pacific coast the Navy carried the mails. It is a precedent which worked out well. It is right, as said by the gentleman from New York this morning, that where we have Government agents in other departments like the War and Navy that can do Government work, like the carriage of the mail in aeroplanes now held by these departments, we should provide that they may do so, and we have the precedent therefor. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I favor the amendment of the gentleman from New York. I am not entirely clear as to what would be the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. If I was sure that it would strike out any right to use this money in aeroplane service, I would very much favor the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

This appropriation is for the purpose of transportation by railroad routes and aeroplanes. Whether an appropriation for transportation by aeroplanes would authorize the purchase of aeroplanes or not I am unable to say at this time. If it would, then, if the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania prevailed, the effect would be to permit the Postmaster General to use as much money as he wanted to use above the amount specified in this paragraph, for the proviso which the gentleman seeks to strike out contains the only limitation on the purchase of aeroplanes now in the paragraph.

I say I am not entirely clear on this point, and for that reason I support the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], which limits the amount which may be expended in the aeroplane service to $300,000, which, I think, is not an unreasonable amount on the whole.

Mr. MOON. Allow me to ask the gentleman. He says it is not unreasonable on the whole. The department thinks it ought to have three or four million dollars to develop it. What sort of an experiment can you make now with $300,000 in building aeroplanes and carrying on this service?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit me to go further, I will show him why I am opposed to this. If you can not experiment with $300,000, how can you experiment with $3,000,000? It only takes $20,000 to build a plane, but the War Department will furnish the planes. The Post Office Department has only to operate them. Is not $300,000 enough to waste? I wish to say again that it is the despair of those who are on the Ways and Means Committee, who endeavor to raise the vast sums which we are using nowadays, to see provisions come in like this appropriating a million to three million dollars for things that are not necessary, that no man claims are necessary, but simply are for things that would be nice to have. It would be a delightful thing if we could transport a letter from New York to this town in an hour and a half, but nobody is particularly benefited by it. And, by the way, I might state that a letter arrived for me last Saturday night in this town which was not delivered to me until the next Monday, although it had a special delivery stamp on it, and we have three deliveries a day at the House Office Building on Sunday. It did not reach me until evening of the second day after it arrived here. If we can get some plain ordinary things done in this Postal Service we could dispense with some of these frills, such as having the mail carried by Airplane Service.

Here is an opportunity to save money. Advantage should be taken of it right here and now. Why should we not make a beginning at this time? We have got to make it or else we have got to do what the recent Secretary of the Treasury has proposed—to sell bonds to pay our interest in 1920. That is the proposition which is pressed at this time. Why? Because the Secretary says the people ought not to be burdened with taxes further. They will not submit to having these war-time taxes kept forever, and we should reduce expenses wherever practicable.

Now, in another body, which I need not mention at this time, a gentleman who is very well informed estimated the expenses for the fiscal year of 1920 at over $10,000,000,000. I think he is right. I think the amount will be more than $10,000,000,000 if we adopt projects like the one under consideration. Here we go on with expenses of this kind, as I said, devoting a million dollars here and a million dollars there, and adding a few more frills that we could dispense with very easily and nobody would be hurt at all. Why should we not cut this out? Why not commence right here to economize? I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] may be sustained. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP). The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS], as I understand it, strikes out the words "Provided further," in line 11, page 15, and all the balance of that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ROBBINS. The balance of the paragraph.

Mr. MOON. It does not interfere with the second proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The way the gentleman from Pennsylvania made his motion was to strike out all the paragraph, commencing with the word "Provided," in line 11, which would include the second proviso and the amendment to the section which has already been adopted.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I am entirely ready to see the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania prevail.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield the floor?

Mr. MOON. Is the amendment of the gentleman from New York the first substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The only motion pending before the committee is the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] to strike out that paragraph.

Mr. MOON. Then strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN. No. The Chair is in error. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has a substitute for that motion, which the Clerk will report for the information of the committee. The Chair was in error.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Clerk first report this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 15, line 13, after the word "exceeding," strike out "$2,185,000 for the purpose of aeroplanes and" and insert in lieu thereof "$500,000 for."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] is recognized.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is agreed by all present that the Government has all the airplanes it needs. It is contended here that we have no power to compel the War Department to turn over to the Post Office Department the airplanes which the War Department does not need and which the Post Office Department can use. Neither the Post Office Department nor the War Department is independent of the Congress. We are through with the war now. The time has come, gentlemen of the committee, when we must coordinate these branches of the Government. No business man, if he had material in one department which he did not need there, would leave such material in that department and purchase the same sort of material for another department in which it was needed. No farmer, if he had farming machinery on one farm which he did not need there but did need on another farm, would go and buy new implements for the second farm while the implements which were not needed were stored in a warehouse on the first farm. He would use some old-fashioned, practical horse sense, and that is what we need to use here. Now, gentlemen, if these departments will not coordinate, we can afford to stop right now and compel them to coordinate. [Applause.]

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. In a moment. Now I am going to offer an amendment to strike out this $2,185,000 and provide that "no part of said funds shall be expended for the purchase of aeroplanes." That is exactly what we ought to say right now. [Applause.]

Mr. EMERSON. Did we not pass a bill some time ago directing the coordination of these departments? In that bill we placed everything practically in the hands of the President, coordinating these departments. Why should we not make an order to that effect?

Mr. SUMNERS. We are confronted by a definite situation. The Chair has ruled that we can not now in this bill direct the War Department to turn over the aeroplanes.

Mr. EMERSON. We could not, but why should not the President?

Mr. SUMNERS. We shall have another day here. This is not the only legislative day. We can see to it that the War Department shall turn over aeroplanes that it does not need for war purposes, and we should not now provide for their purchase by the Post Office Department. Everybody knows that many of the airplanes that we now have will be put into the scrap heap in the course of a few years. Why not use them before they become obsolete? It is ridiculous not to use these airplanes now. Everybody knows that airplanes of the present type will in course of time be superseded by other types and go out of use. Let us see if we can not bring out of the War Department's hangars some of these airplanes that can be used now for the mail service and save the people's money for a necessary use.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is a substitute for what? I want to find out.

Mr. SUMNERS. Striking out the item of $2,185,000.

Mr. CANNON. And inserting $300,000?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It would not do to strike out without inserting, as the gentleman [Mr. SUMNERS] who last addressed the committee stated it was his intention at the proper time to do, striking out $2,185,000. That would not do, because, unless you went up there on lines 7 and 8 and struck out "aeroplanes, $61,500,000," you would not accomplish your purpose.

Mr. SUMNERS. That provides that no part of this fund shall be expended for the purchase of airplanes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. My amendment will read this way: "That out of this appropriation the Postmaster General is authorized to spend not exceeding $300,000 for the operation and maintenance of airplane service."

Mr. CANNON. Without the purchase?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. That is a limitation, simply striking out the $2,185,000 and putting in $300,000?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is simply for operation, not to purchase, because he has the machines now.

Mr. CANNON. I will vote for any amendment that will curtail the appropriation or legislation on this bill for the aeroplane service. We are falling into a very bad habit, that of putting all important legislation almost, more and more all the time, on appropriation bills without due consideration. The Aeroplane Service may or may not be a good service. It is being tested. I am quite in harmony with the proposition that after full consideration we should take care of the aeroplanes that the Government owns and that are not needed by the War Department and put to this service to give it a fair trial.

But why not let the great committees of the House deal with that proposition of initiating new service, considering it, and let it be reported in the House, and let us have a fair chance to amend and consider fully, rather than to put it on by the multiplied millions that frequently in effect lead to tens and hundreds of millions expenditure with a hop, skip, and a jump that must pass to maintain the Post Office Service, and to be settled finally when the last hours of the short session of Congress come by an agreement between the conference committees of the House and the Senate if there be disagreement. I would like to, and I think I will, offer, when this amendment is disposed of, an amendment to strike out of lines 7 and 8 the words "and aeroplanes."

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, the bill as reported by the committee makes an appropriation of $2,185,000 for the purchase of aeroplanes and maintenance and operation of the aeroplane service. It is admitted by the distinguished gentleman on the committee who reported the bill that only one-half a million dollars would be needed for the putting of this service into operation if the Government was permitted to use the aeroplanes owned by the Government. It is agreed by all, and I believe by the War Department and the Secretary of War, that after the declaration of peace that but few of the aeroplanes now owned by the Government will be needed for War Department purposes, and I have every reason to believe that if that discretion is not taken away from the Secretary of War he will exercise his discretion in favor of the Government and this service and deliver to the Postmaster General all the machines needed. But if he does not, shall we stand by and appropriate $2,000,000 to buy something that we already have? [Applause.] Why not remove his discretion and make it mandatory on the Secretary of War to turn over the machines now owned by the Government and not needed by the War Department, turn them over to the Post Office Department for carrying the mails according to the act of Congress. I do not believe there will be any trouble about it, but if there is I think we ought to act on the suggestion of the Chairman and reduce the appropriation $500,000 and amend the bill so that no part of the appropriation shall be used for the purchase of aeroplanes, but limit it to maintenance and operation of the aeroplane service.

The Chair has held, and I think properly, that we could not strike out the provision that gives the discretion in the former bill to the Secretary of War. But if found necessary we can, in the next 10 days, pass a separate bill taking away that discretion from the Secretary of War. We had better do that than to spend $2,000,000 for something that we already own and is not needed in the War Department. This is no time to appropriate money to purchase something already owned by the Government.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman that I think in the main we ought to use things we have got and not spend money to buy more. I think the point of order against the bill that the Chair properly held out of order will cost the Government about $1,000,000 in order that a gentleman might show his learning on the subject of parliamentary law. I want to say further that $500,000 will not buy many machines and operate them. Now, I want to be perfectly candid with the House; I can not afford not to be. The suggestion I made a while ago was that if you strike out all of the second proviso it will leave $61,000,000 subject to be used by the Postmaster General for inland transportation by any sort of means—aeroplanes or railroad within the limitation. Of course, if you want to go to the top of the section and strike out the word "aeroplanes," as the gentleman from Illinois suggested, you destroy the aeroplane system entirely.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to ask the gentleman about the language for inland transportation by railroad routes and aeroplanes. Under that language the Postmaster General could not purchase any aeroplanes, could he, any more than he could purchase a railroad, unless some legislation gave him that authority to purchase aeroplanes? I would not think he would have the authority to purchase them.

Mr. MOON. That may or may not be, I would not undertake to say; but it vests the power for the operation of machines, and I do not see how he could operate the machines unless he had them.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SUMNERS. If the gentleman who has offered an amendment accepts my substitute will it be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman who has offered an amendment can withdraw it with the consent of the committee. It is not in order for two substitutes to be pending at the same time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is no substitute pending, notwithstanding the mover may have called it a substitute. The motion was to strike out a part of the text. Then there was an amendment proposing to perfect the text. That is not and could not be a substitute for the motion to strike out the text. The only proposition pending is a motion to strike out the text and a second amendment to perfect the text, which is to be voted on first. A substitute can be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the proposition that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] offered an amendment to strike out certain lines in the bill. The gentleman from New York offered what he called a substitute. The Chair had not examined it to see whether it was a substitute, and when the Chair answered the gentleman from Texas he took it that there was a substitute pending, and stated that two substitutes could not be pending at the same time.

Mr. MANN. The Chair would be correct, but the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is an amendment to the text which it is proposed to be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee will indulge the Chair a moment, the Chair will examine the amendment. The Chair has examined the amendment, and it is undoubtedly not a substitute, but is an amendment to the text, to perfect the text, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Therefore no substitute being now pending, under the rules of the House a substitute is in order, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas to offer a substitute.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. SUMNERS: Page 15, line 11, after the word "further" strike out down to and including the word "determined," in line 15, and insert in lieu thereof the words: "No part of said funds shall be expended for the purchase of aeroplanes."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I shall detain the committee just for a moment. Gentlemen of the committee, I deem it hardly necessary to explain the amendment offered. It provides for the elimination of the item of $2,185,000 for the purchase of aeroplanes. If there is any question in the mind of any gentleman of the committee which he would like to propound while I have the floor I should be very glad, indeed, to undertake to answer.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it would prohibit the use of any of the money for the purchase of aeroplanes, but would give to the Postmaster General practically unlimited money for the maintenance and operation of aeroplanes.

Mr. SUMNERS. It does not affect the purpose of any feature of the section except the one dealing with the purchase of aeroplanes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; the gentleman strikes out the limitation for the purchase, operation, and maintenance of aeroplanes. His amendment prohibits the use of the money for the purchase of aeroplanes, but under the provision of the first portion of the paragraph the Postmaster General would be authorized to operate and maintain aeroplanes.

Mr. SUMNERS. But the amendment offered prohibits the use of any part of the fund for purchasing aeroplanes, but does not contemplate limiting operation.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not propose to limit that?

Mr. SUMNERS. No; it is not my purpose—the amendment was hastily drawn—to place a limitation upon the authority and power of the Postmaster General to expend money for the operation and maintenance of aeroplanes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I understand the gentleman now, it would seem to me that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], which provided that $300,000 might be used for the operation and maintenance, would be what we want.

Mr. SUMNERS. It would be, provided the item of $300,000 is sufficient to operate and maintain. I am not advised on that point.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is all they asked for, and on page 60 the Postmaster General said that was all he wanted.

Mr. SUMNERS. Then with that statement I should be glad to withdraw the amendment just offered, but I do insist upon the elimination of authority to purchase aeroplanes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his amendment. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS], which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee offers the following: Strike out the paragraph beginning with line 7 and insert:

"For inland transportation by railroad routes and aeroplanes, $59,825,000: Provided, That not to exceed $1,000,000 be expended for payment of freight and incidental charges for the transportation of mails conveyed under special arrangements in freight trains or otherwise: Provided further, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster General is authorized to expend not exceeding $500,000 for the purchase of aeroplanes and the operation and maintenance of aeroplane service between such places as may be determined: Provided further, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to deliver immediately to the Postmaster General 100 De Haviland 4 aeroplanes, 100 Handley-Pages, 10 Glen Martin day bombers, all planes completely assembled and with the necessary spare parts; also 100 extra Liberty engines with spare parts, 50 Hispano-Suiza engines with 300-horsepower motors and 20 Hispano-Suiza engines with 150-horsepower motors, the same to be out of any equipment that the War Department has on hand or under construction, the War Department appropriation to be credited with the equipment to be turned over to the Post Office Department: And provided further, That separate accounts be kept of the amount expended for aeroplane service."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that portion of the amendment providing for the turning over of property from the War Department to the Post Office Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman upon that and call his attention to the provisions of the Holman rule.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say to the Chair that while the present occupant of the chair was out the previous occupant of the chair ruled upon this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. While the present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the time, he was in the Hall, and he heard the ruling of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, Judge SAUNDERS; as the amendment was proposed then the present occupant of the chair is in perfect accord with that ruling; but the present occupant of the chair thinks the proposed substitute now offered is capable of differentiation from the Moon amendment under the Holman rule, as it is reducing by about $2,000,000 the amount covered in this appropriation bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think the Chair would want to rule that an amendment which would be proper under the Holman rule could also have tacked onto it a further amendment which was neither germane to the amendment itself nor to the bill and thereby make this last amendment, which was not germane, in order. If so, it seems to me, there is no limitation to where we would stop under the Holman rule. We have simply got to get the first part of it so that it will be admissible under the Holman rule, by providing for reduction of expenditures, and then we can go on and insert something that is not germane at all, if the ruling of the previous occupant of the Chair is correct as to germaneness—something that is not germane either to the amendment itself or to the bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If the Chair will permit me to say a word, did the Chair hear the previous occupant of the chair when he said that the direction of the Secretary of War to deliver over to a separate department these aeroplanes was new legislation and could not be supported?

The CHAIRMAN. It is unquestionably new law, and it is permissible under rules of the House to adopt new law and legislate on an appropriation bill, providing it comes within the purview of the Holman rule.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Very true, as I stated; but, Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will indulge me a moment——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. May we introduce an amendment which reduces expenses and thereby comes under the Holman rule, and then by virtue of that amendment tack on also a further amendment which is neither germane as a part of the regular amendment nor to the bill itself? If so, there is no limitation as to where we will land under the Holman rule. We will get anything whatever in there because the rule with regard to germaneness is of no consequence whatever. All we have to do is to have some entirely disconnected provision which is admissible under the Holman rule, and then put on something else which has no connection whatever with the nature of the proviso, and have it dragged in by virtue of the first part of the amendment which is admissible under the Holman rule. I hardly think the Chair can find a ruling in support of that, although I yield with great deference to the opinion of the Chair, knowing he is well informed on these subjects and an authority with reference to parliamentary practice.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa is right in saying that an amendment that is not germane ought not to be held in order, and that is the rule; but under the Holman rule any amendment which reduces the amount of money covered in the bill with legislation attached to it is in order if it is germane, and the question is whether it is germane. The Chair will decide that. We have been discussing the matter here nearly all the afternoon on the Post Office bill. I made a few remarks on the subject, the gentleman from Iowa made a few lucid remarks on the subject, many other Members of the House made remarks on the subject, all of them, I hope, thinking their remarks were germane to the proposition under consideration in the bill, and unless we have all been out of order in talking as we have then the amendment is germane to the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will hear me, I take it from the remark of the Chairman in passing obiter upon the decision of the former occupant of the chair, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], that he agrees with the gentleman from Virginia that his ruling was correct, that the amendment then presented for consideration was not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will permit the Chair, the Chair understands the crux of the ruling of the gentleman from Virginia was this was legislation and, therefore, being legislation it was not in order on an appropriation bill, but the Chair does not——

Mr. STAFFORD. I take issue with the Chairman in that particular, and the decision of the then Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia, will sustain the position that the gravamen of his decision was that it was not germane, and that for it to be germane it was necessary to be directly connected with the matter in issue, and that the mere authorization of the purchase—I can not use his exact words—the mere authorization of the purchase of aeroplanes did not warrant authority to direct another department to turn over supplies. It was based fundamentally not on the position that it was legislation on an appropriation bill, but because the subject matter presented to the consideration of the House was not germane to the matter carried in the bill. Now, I direct the attention of the Chair to the fact that the Holman rule relates to legislation, forbidding legislation on an appropriation bill; that if the amendment itself shows that a reduction of the amount will result in a retrenchment of expenditure, so far as the rule is concerned that forbids legislation on an appropriation bill, that then it will be in order, but it does not remove the rule of germaneness, and I direct the Chair's attention——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in full accord with the proposition and he does not care to argue it.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair is going to adhere to the ruling of the pro tempore Chairman, and if there is any question about his position, I would request that the ruling of the gentleman from Virginia be read for the information of the committee, and the Chair will find that his ruling was that the amendment was not germane. Now, this is the very point in issue here. It is the same amendment, the identical amendment, that was not germane to the provision carried in this bill. For the sake of consistency of ruling on the same afternoon, I know the present occupant of the chair is not going to cast aside the decision and the raison d'être of the decision of the gentleman from Virginia, because I know he has very high regard for the gentleman from Virginia. I leave it to the Chair to adhere to the ruling made in that instance—that it was not germane—and in this instance for the same reason—it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Tennessee offered a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but for the purpose of this decision the Chair can state that the amendment is a substitute for the language in the appropriation bill, and the effect of the amendment is to reduce the amount appropriated in the bill from $61,500,000 to $55,825,000, and it provides, in lieu of making an appropriation of $2,185,000 available for the purchase, maintenance, and the operation of aeroplanes in the management of the inland postal service of the United States, that the Secretary of War shall turn over to the Post Office Department certain aeroplanes owned by the Government, to be used in that service, and so forth. Now, the question presents itself to the Chair under the point of order made whether this amendment is germane and if it is legislation on an appropriation bill, whether it is in order under the rules of the House. Clause 2 of Rule XXI of the House provides:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment—

Referring to general appropriation bills—

thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States—

Of course, the amendment does not do that—by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States—

The amendment does not do that—or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

The amendment here reduces the amount covered by the bill by over a million dollars. Then the question presents itself to the Chair to determine whether the amendment is germane and whether the legislation proposed in the amendment is germane and logically follows the reduction of the amount covered in the bill.

Now, the Chair has the greatest respect for the decision of the able gentleman who ruled a few moments ago on this amendment without the amount in the bill being reduced, and the Chair heard that decision and the Chair understood the point of order to be sustained because the amendment legislated, and legislation is not in order on an appropriation bill except in special cases. The present occupant of the chair is forced to conclude that the subject we are dealing with is aeroplanes for the use of the Government in the Postal Service and that an amendment proposing aeroplanes owned by the Government under the control of another branch be turned over to the Postal Department is germane. And while it is legislation, in the opinion of the Chair it is germane to the provision of the bill we are discussing; by the amendment the amount appropriated in the bill is reduced, and the reduction naturally follows the legislation proposed; and, therefore, under the Holman rule, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee very well understands what is accomplished by this amendment, and I do not care to take up any further time of the committee in the discussion of it. Briefly stated, for the benefit of any gentleman who may not have been here during the discussion of this matter within the last hour or two, it accomplishes——

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. SHERWOOD. As I heard the amendment read it seemed to say for the purchase and operation of.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is the exact language, I will say to the gentleman, that is carried in the bill. The only change is in the amount. This is exactly the language carried in the bill except the change in amount plus the amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] requiring the War Department and making it mandatory upon them to turn over to the Post Office Department for the public service these aeroplanes, engines, and fixtures.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. STAFFORD. To follow that part of the gentleman's amendment just prior to the direction to the Secretary of War to turn over a certain number of aeroplanes and motors to the Postmaster General.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD moves to amend the substitute by inserting after the word "determined," the following:

"That the Postmaster General in expending the appropriation herein for aeroplane service shall purchase, so far as possible, the aeroplanes, motors, equipment, and supplies from the War Department and Navy Department when no longer required, because of the cessation of war activities. It shall be the duty of the Postmaster General before purchasing any of such articles to ascertain whether the War or Navy Department has articles of the character described that are serviceable, and articles purchased from either of said departments, if the same have not been used, shall be paid for at a reasonable price, not to exceed actual cost, and if the same have been used, at a reasonable price based upon length of usage. Said departments are authorized to sell such articles to the Post Office Department under the conditions specified, and the proceeds of such sales shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin was recognized and started his speech, and, under the rules of the House, the gentleman from Missouri is too late.

Mr. BORLAND. I thought the chairman of the committee would raise the point of order.

Mr. MOON. The chairman of the committee was looking after his interests. I favor the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this is similar to the provision carried in the District appropriation bill that passed the House a few days ago. There is no question but what the War Department and perhaps the Navy Department have large quantities of aeroplanes in their possession that are no longer needed for war activities. There is no question but what these departments have other supplies that could be used by other activities of the Government.

The House a few days ago established the policy, and a very commendable one, that when any of these war-engaged bureaus and departments have supplies that are utilizable by other departments the departments having need of them should first call upon them and purchase those supplies before going into the market and purchasing other supplies. We are about to launch on a new policy so far as the purchase or use of aeroplanes is concerned. I thought I would present this amendment as being in harmony with the policy adopted by the House in connection with the District appropriation bill.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he does not believe, in making this arrangement, some provision ought to be carried under which the Government machine shops could be used for repairing these aeroplanes? Now, the Government has a number of repair depots stationed over the country, and, unless some provision is made, after the Government gets its aeroplanes it will have to either construct machine shops or have them repaired in other shops, while the Government machine shops would not be in use.

Mr. STAFFORD. In reply to the gentleman's inquiry, I would say it is outside of the provision and independent of the idea carried in the amendment that I have offered. For my part, I am quite in sympathy with the policy suggested to the committee to-day by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I think there will be a duplication of activities for the Government to have one branch of the service like the military developing men in the experimentation and use of aircraft and at the same time allowing the Postmaster General to carry on independent operations without the cooperation and without the assistance of the military.

With that idea in mind I made the point of order so that the air service under the Postal Service could not all of a sudden grow into a tremendously expensive adjunct by developing an airplane service with hundreds and hundreds of planes. I thought it was far better for the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to have hearings whereby the representatives of the military branches of the Government could come before it and give the committee the benefit of their views and experience rather than with only limited knowledge on the subject for us to legislate here. But certainly this amendment that has been proposed by me is in consonance with sound governmental and business methods, and I submit it for the consideration it deserves.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is offered as an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. The proposition of the gentleman was that the Government should turn over from the War Department to the Post Office Department certain specified airplanes, to be used in establishing this airplane postal service, and that logically follows, as the Chairman has ruled, the reduction in the amount carried in the bill.

A part of the reduction is involved in the provision that the airplanes now owned by the Government in another department shall be turned over to and used by the Post Office Department. The gentleman from Wisconsin undertakes to amend that by providing that the Post Office Department shall buy these airplanes from the War Department. That, of course, would not logically follow any reduction in the bill, and therefore it would not have been in order if the point had been made in time.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware that the Garrett amendment authorizes the purchase of machines?

Mr. BORLAND. I am aware that it authorizes the purchase of machines, but it also directs the War Department to turn over certain machines; and the Chair, as I understand, rules that the part turning over the machines was logically connected with the reduction.

Mr. MANN. I think so; but if the Post Office Department is going to purchase any machines, why should it not have the privilege of purchasing parts? I take it it would not be machines. Why should it not have the privilege of purchasing parts from the War Department?

Mr. BORLAND. That is not the whole scope of the gentleman's amendment. If it were, I think there might be something said in its favor. The scope is that we shall buy these airplanes. The only theory upon which we would direct the machines to be turned over at all is the theory that they have ceased to be necessary for the use of the War Department. If that is true—and that is the only argument upon which the turning of them over can be predicated—then why should they be bought from the War Department, and what would be done with the money that was paid for them? Would it be put in the aeroplane fund and used for the purchase of more unnecessary machines? Just exactly why we should buy them from the War Department when the Government already owns, presumptively, more machines than it can use in that department?

The whole purpose and scope of the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee is violated by this amendment. It has no relation whatever to the attempted economy which is suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman acquainted with the order of the President, made by him on the eve of his departure for France, whereby the departments of the Government—the War and Navy Departments and all other boards and bureaus with war activities are obliged to turn over to the Supply Committee of the Treasury Department all supplies that are not needed by them in connection with the further operation of their departments and activities, and that all other departments are compelled to purchase their supplies from this Supply Committee, and that the amounts so paid shall be turned back into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts? This amendment is directly in harmony with the suggestion of the President in that order.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me ask the gentleman why does he desire these supplies to be purchased instead of turned over? What does he expect to accomplish?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not forecast what the ultimate form of this amendment will be in when it is enacted into law, and, further, it affords a check by Congress on the amount of supplies that are so transferred.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is responsible for the form he puts it in.

Mr. STAFFORD. I accept that responsibility. There is a fund of $500,000 put in the hands of the Postmaster General with which to purchase supplies. The War Department has vast supplies. I think the Postmaster General should be compelled, as the amendment requires, to go to the War Department and obtain these supplies from the War Department, if they are no longer needed there, instead of going out in the open market and purchasing them.

Mr. BORLAND. Why should not that be a general regulation?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a general regulation as to supplies no longer needed to be turned over to the Treasury Department, supplies such as desks and furniture and the like. And that very order provides—and it is an Executive order—that the various departments shall purchase their supplies out of the contingent funds, and the Treasury Department shall turn these receipts over to the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman has just there revealed the weakness of his attitude. These supplies are to be turned over to the supply committee when no longer needed by the departments. We are legislating on the assumption that the War Department does not need these airplanes. We are not asking them whether they no longer need them, but we are deciding that question, which is a very important proposition. We say to the War Department, "You do not need these airplanes and therefore we will require you to turn them over as a matter of economy and efficiency to the Post Office Department."

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are patriotic in their endeavor to conserve the revenues of the Government, and they are not going to retain to-day supplies that they do not need when other branches of the Government need them; but if they do not need them and decline to turn them over they can be directed by Congress to turn them over.

Mr. BORLAND. But the gentleman is going on the theory that the War Department thinks they do not need these airplanes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not quite get the theory of my friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. So far there has been no proposition made to eliminate that portion of the Garrett amendment, which provides that the airplanes shall be turned over by the War Department to the Post Office Department. And if we are to have an airplane service conducted by the Post Office Department, I would certainly be in favor of that proposition. I do not understand that the Stafford amendment interferes with that. That is where I am willing to receive enlightenment. I understood that the Garrett amendment directed absolutely that certain machines should be turned over by the War Department to the Post Office Department and also included a provision that the Post Office Department might purchase machines within the limit—purchase, operation, and maintenance—for $500,000. While I do not apprehend they could purchase many machines under that appropriation, I do apprehend that the purchase of the parts of machines will be necessary of somebody somewhere, and it would seem that there would be no objection from the War Department or the Navy Department if the Post Office Department required these parts to purchase them from the War or Navy Department.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand the Garrett amendment is to include the turning over of not only aeroplanes and engines, but the spare parts.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. BORLAND. In other words, my understanding is that it directs the War Department to turn over whatever it can turn over now.

Mr. MANN. Whatever it can turn over immediately, but not what it can turn over a year from this time. I take it that if they operate the aeroplanes they will soon require new parts if they do not require new machines. At any rate, the Garrett amendment authorizes the purchase, and if we are to have the purchase I think we ought to permit the War Department to sell the machines and parts to the Post Office Department, as I was in favor the other day of permitting the District Commissioners to purchase from the various departments of the Government the material which they no longer needed.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment which is offered is appropriate and ought to be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] offered an amendment to strike out certain lines of the bill. To that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] offered an amendment to perfect the text. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] offered a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out a certain paragraph of the bill and the gentleman from Wisconsin offered an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. The vote will first be had on perfecting the original text and next on perfecting the substitute before the vote is had on whether the substitute shall prevail over the original text. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 13, after the word "exceeding," strike out "$2,185,000 for the purchase of aeroplanes and" and insert in lieu thereof "$300,000 for."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment just read.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOON) there were—ayes 30, noes 33.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The question of ordering tellers was taken, and 16 Members arose.

The CHAIRMAN. Not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if I may be indulged before the vote is put on the amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can proceed without objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to offer a suggestion to my colleague from Wisconsin. I am reliably informed that there will be an amendment offered as an opportunity is presented to strike out the provision for the purchase of aeroplanes. It will leave the amount the same, but it will strike out the provision for the purchase.

Now, if the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin prevails, as I have no doubt it will, as there seems to be no committee opposition to it and as it is a reasonable amendment, there is some language in there which I think the gentleman would not desire to have in if the amendment prevails to strike out the provision for the purchase of aeroplanes. I suggest, if agreeable to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that temporarily, by unanimous consent, he withhold the amendment until the gentleman from Alabama can offer the amendment to strike out the provision for the purchase. Let that be voted on, and then, if it prevails, I think the gentleman from Wisconsin would want to strike out the word "aeroplanes" from his amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. My purpose in presenting the amendment is to have it a part of the bill when it goes to the Senate. It is in harmony with all the legislation that we are proposing in utilizing supplies no longer necessary. We can not forecast what attitude the Senate will take on this important proposition, and it should be a part of the bill when it goes to the Senate. I do not think there will be any great discord in the amendment if the word "purchase" should be eliminated. I think we had better proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the substitute was agreed to.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a substitute:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ALMON: After the words "five hundred thousand dollars for," strike out the words "the purchase of aeroplanes and."

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, the Post Office Department has made known to the committee the number and kind of aeroplanes needed for the aeroplane service. It is also agreed that the Government already owns all the aeroplanes that will be needed by the Post Office Department. For that reason I offer this amendment, so that no part of this half a million dollars will be used by the Postmaster General for the purchase of aeroplanes, but that it be used solely for the operation and maintenance of an aeroplane service. Of course, they could use a part of this half million dollars for the buying of parts, because that would be a part of the expense and maintenance, but no part of it should be used for the purchase of aeroplanes themselves, as they can be furnished by the War Department.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that that is too close a limitation. If you are going to do any good with this service, you ought not to hamper the Postmaster General in that way. It may be that he might want to purchase several aeroplanes as well as operate them. With the fact before you that he can not now under the law that has been passed get a single aeroplane I believe we better just leave the language as it is and give him at least some discretion as to the $500,000. If you are not going to give him any discretion, just wipe out the whole thing.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the original provision in the paragraph was—

For inland transportation by railroad routes and aeroplanes, $61,500,000.

The committee inserted a limitation in that so that the Postmaster General might not expend more than $2,185,000 for purchase, maintenance, and operation. It was a question in my mind when the propositions were presented to the committee a while ago whether, if you strike out the limitation, you do not authorize the Postmaster General to spend as much as he pleases of the $61,500,000 for operation, for maintenance, and for purchase. In other words, under the original provision of the text, if there had been no limitation the Postmaster General would have had authority, I am inclined to think, to use such portions of the entire appropriation as he pleased for the purchase of aeroplanes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. Suppose we should authorize $100,000 for screen-wagon service and have no authority of law to purchase, does the gentleman think the Postmaster General would have the right to go out and purchase Government-owned vehicles to operate that service?

Mr. MANN. I think he has exercised that right. He has purchased automobiles without any specific authority of Congress. He purchased and owned railroad cars without any specific authority of Congress, so far as I remember.

Mr. BLACK. I do not agree or disagree with the gentleman on that proposition, because I do not have the information; but I do not think he would have the right to go out and make these direct purchases without authority of law.

Mr. MANN. There are certain things that he could not purchase. He probably can not purchase land, but if you authorize the Postmaster General to do certain things, and if there is no way to do it except by the purchase of certain things, he probably can make the purchase. Whether that be the case or not is not so pertinent. I was inclined to think he would have the authority. It is perfectly plain to me that if you strike out the word "purchase" here and put no limitation on the purchase and have included a provision in the bill in the same paragraph that he may purchase from the War Department, that he can purchase without limit. The Stafford amendment authorizes the purchase, and it has been agreed to by the committee, by the Post Office Department, and any law officer of the Government would say it was a very silly aggregation of men in Congress who would make an appropriation of $61,000,000 for the maintenance of an aeroplane system and then authorize the purchase from the War Department and say they could not use the money for that purpose.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That was why I ventured to express to my friend the wish that he would withdraw temporarily his amendment.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I am not sure that the Stafford amendment should be agreed to under the conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama to the substitute.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment of Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee by adding the following:

"Provided, That said planes, motors, and material be operated, repaired, and maintained by the personnel of the Air Service of the Army."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. If it was germane to turn over the machines of the War Department to the Post Office Department, I do not see why it is not germane to provide that those machines be operated by the personnel of the Army. It is simply a question of appropriation. These machines were purchased by the War Department out of money appropriated for the War Department, and there is no reason, if the committee is acting in good faith, why they can not go the whole limit and do this thing right. What you have now is a botched up job. You have machines that the Post Office can not take care of, they can not maintain, and you are just taking machines out of proper care and turning them over to the Post Office. It is the most unintelligent piece of legislation—and that is saying a whole lot—that the Sixty-fifth Congress has ever passed. It is up to you, gentlemen.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for a moment upon this. I think this amendment is admissible under the Holman rule. It reduces expenses very clearly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman, but the Chair's mind is made up.

Mr. STAFFORD. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then I reoffer the amendment with a further amendment to it, adding the words "without expense to the Post Office Department."

Mr. MOON. I make the point of order on that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I shall wait until I shall hear the ruling of the Chair, and if that is not in order then I shall offer still another.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order on the ground that the amendment nowhere reduces the amount covered by the bill, does not reduce the number of employees or officers of the Government, and does not fall within the limits of the Holman rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire in that connection, with all due respect to the Chair, if the amendment now proposed had been originally incorporated as a part of the Garrett amendment, the Garrett amendment reducing expenditures, would the Chair then hold that the amendment was not germane to the matter contained in the Garrett amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been here long enough not to cross bridges until he arrives at them.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the question that is up to the Chair.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: "Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended for the operations of the said planes, motors, and material which shall be maintained and operated by the personnel of the Air Service of the Army."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let the amendment be reported; there may be a point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state there is no point of order made on the amendment.

Mr. MOON. The amendment never has been reported under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GREEN of Iowa offers the following amendment to the Garrett amendment: Add at the end of the Garrett amendment the following proviso:

"Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended for the operation of the said planes, motors, and material which shall be maintained by the personnel of the Air Service of the Army."

Mr. MOON. I make a point of order on it.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this section be read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is pending. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. LITTLE. What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is that this is legislation that is not in order on this appropriation bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is logical.

Mr. LITTLE. Let the gentleman state what his point of order is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is only passing upon it.

Mr. MANN. If that is the point of order, of course that is not any good, because this is an amendment in the way of legislation to an amendment, which is all legislation, practically, and which is in order under the Holman rule. So far as its being legislation is concerned, if that is the point of order that is made, why the Chair will readily see that point of order is not good.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, of course, spoke hastily. The Chair understood the gentleman makes the point that this amendment was not in order because it added affirmative direction and added additional legislation that was not germane to the legislation proposed in the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If that is the point of order, I would like to be heard very briefly. I do not see how the Chair could possibly hold it is not germane after having held the other amendment was germane. This relates to the disposition of these particular aeroplanes provided for in the original Garrett amendment, tells how they shall be disposed of and used, so it seems to me it is very clearly germane.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-three gentleman are present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MOON. Well, Mr. Chairman, as gentlemen seem to be anxious to rise, and while I would be glad to work on, I defer to their wishes, and I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13308, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent Mr. MUDD was granted leave of absence for 10 days on account of sickness.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with to-morrow so that we may take up the Post Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday in order to take up this appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] when we may expect to be given an opportunity to take up the Private Calendar. There are a number of undisputed bills on that calendar which passed the last Congress and did not pass the Senate for want of time.

Mr. KITCHIN. If we get through with this bill in time, by Friday, we can take that calendar up on Friday. I propose to ask to take up the Private Calendar on Friday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask what would be in order if this bill should be concluded early to-morrow afternoon—what would be taken up?

Mr. KITCHIN. We have no appropriation bill ready to take up, and in that case we could take up the Private Calendar on Thursday.

Mr. WALSH. Will it be in order to adjourn after passing this bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman means to-morrow afternoon; yes. We will adjourn when we get through with this bill to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the Post Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 18, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent owing to illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

SENATORS FROM GEORGIA AND ALABAMA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following document which has been sent to the Chair. It will be read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The Secretary read as follows:

The State of Georgia. By his excellency Hugh M. Dorsey, governor of said State.

To the Hon. WILLIAM J. HARRIS, greeting:

Whereas by the Constitution of the United States of America it is ordained and established that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of Members chosen every six years by the people of the several States; and

Whereas by the returns made agreeably to law of the election held on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1918, for a Member of the Senate to represent this State in the Senate of the United States for six years, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1919, you were duly elected by the people of this State.

These are, therefore, to commission you, the said WILLIAM J. HARRIS, to take session in the Senate of the United States for six years beginning on the 4th day of March, 1919, and to use and exercise all and every the privileges and powers which of right you may or can do in and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States in behalf of this State.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State at the capitol in Atlanta, this 3d day of December, in the year of our Lord 1918, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and forty-third.

HUGH M. DORSEY, Governor.

By the governor:
[SEAL.]

HENRY B. STRANGE,
Secretary of State.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I present the credentials of my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] for the new term for which he has been elected. I ask that they be read and filed.

The credentials were read and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 5th day of November, 1918, JOHN H. BANKHEAD was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Alabama a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1919.

Witness: His excellency our governor of Alabama and our seal hereto affixed at the capitol this 19th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1918.

CHARLES HENDERSON, Governor.

By the governor:
[SEAL.]

JOHN PURIDOY,
Secretary of State.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I had the privilege some days ago of handing you the usual form of certificate of election of my future colleague, Mr. HARRIS, which was laid before the Senate and placed on file in the ordinary course. I only desire to call attention to it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This document came to the Chair with the request that it be laid before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my attention was diverted. What disposition was made of that credential?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Which one?

Mr. LODGE. The Harris credential.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator from Georgia spoke of it as having been placed on file.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Senator from Georgia informed the Senate, the regular certificate was handed down some days since. This is a commission from the governor to the effect that Mr. HARRIS will appear and take his seat here on the 4th of March next. It is not in the form of a credential; but it came with the request that it be laid before the Senate, and it has been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. LODGE. What was the other credential?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It conformed to the usual conditions as provided by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The other was in the usual form, as ordered by the Senate. This is going to be the rule of the Chair, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate. The Senate adopted a form to be followed by the governors of the various States when certifying to the election of United States Senators. When the credentials come in that form they will be laid before the Senate, and unless the Senate takes some other action they will be placed on file, but when they come in some other form and do not comply with the resolution of the Senate they will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think this document was not necessary at this time. The certificate that I presented was in the regular form required by the Senate, and my only desire was to mention the fact that the certificate, in pursuance of the form prescribed by the Senate, had been filed and had taken the usual course.

Mr. LODGE. If I may ask, was the other credential, which I understand was that of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], placed on file?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was the regular certificate, and was filed. On December 3 the regular certificate of the Senator elect from Georgia was placed on file.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is a supplemental commission issued by the governor that I do not think was necessary.

Mr. LODGE. I was asking about another credential, which I understand was presented and placed on file.

PAY OF THE NAVY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation requesting that the temporary increases in the pay of the Navy as authorized by the act approved May 22, 1917, be made permanent, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

STATEMENT OF EXPENSES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office showing a statement of expenses incurred in detailing temporary clerks from the office of one surveyor general to another, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, requested the Senate to return to the House for correction the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, codify, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KNOX obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield that I may present some telegrams, which I ask be noted in the RECORD. They relate to the railroad situation.

Mr. KNOX. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Sawyer Godfrey Co., of Jacksonville, Fla., praying for the speedy return of the railroads to private ownership, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a resolution from the Central Trades and Labor Council of Jacksonville, Fla., and a telegram in the nature of a resolution from the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen, Lodge No. 540, of Tampa, Fla., favoring the extension of Government ownership of railroads, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a telegram from the Henry W. Horst Co., of Moline, Ill., relative to the housing project at Rock Island, Moline, and East Moline, Ill., which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am going to call for the regular order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a communication with reference to the State of Florida and the United States courts, which I move be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a communication in the nature of a petition from the Federal grand jury for the southern district of Florida, praying for an increase in the compensation for members of the grand and petit juries and for witnesses before the Federal courts. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of the Iron Trades Council of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the Government's contracting with Chinese shipbuilders, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HOUSING PROPOSITION.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to present a communication that probably ought to go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It is an offer from a business firm in Rock Island, Ill., to take over the housing proposition for the Government at that place, complete all the buildings, and they will then pay cost, so that the Government will be out nothing. Probably it is the most intelligent salvage offer that has come to the attention of the Senate. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

Mr. McLEAN. I present a brief extract from the proceedings of the New England Baptist convention, held at Asbury Park, N. J., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE 1918 STATE OF COUNTRY.

[The New England Baptist convention at Mount Pisgah Baptist Church, Asbury Park, N. J., June 13–17, 1918. By Rev. W. B. Reed, D. D., Hartford, Conn.]

War has been declared against all sin through all ages by the Throne of all power. War has been declared by our convention against sin, unrighteousness, class of racial laws, and we meet in this forty-fourth annual session to report progress. War has been declared by four-fifths of the world against autocracy, against political slavery, oppression, brute force, and discrimination against the weak; the price for this blessed world freedom is being paid in sacrifice, privation, untold suffering, blood, and death.

Never since man dropped from the breath of God has the world waded through such carnage of war. Never since the old serpent poured out his vials of sin, deception, and grief in the home of man have nations given the flower of their manhood that freedom might be written around the world. Never since civilization lifted men to councils of reformation, order, and law have women and children been sacrificed as now in the midst of this civilization. Never since treaties between nations were written have nations joined themselves together for a victory to be handed down to nations yet unborn. The world is in arms for world freedom and lasting peace among the nations great and small. What is to be the answer to this great conflagration upon fields of battle? On what side of the line through countless streams of blood will victory be written? Shall the unspeakable Kaiser, with his bloody sword, spoil the treasures of earth and his war lords become masters of the human family? Or shall truth be enthroned throughout the world, democracy proclaimed in every country, and individual liberty safeguarded in every home and upon every highway?

We almost hold our breath as the war news is flashed upon the bulletin board, less adversity should curse the human race. Thousands of fathers like Eli of old wait for tidings from the battle ground, inquiring from returning heralds, "What is there done?" Womanhood trembles while Prussianism shoots further and further its gaseous calamities among the children of men.

Our Nation has decreed that an honorable grave is more to be desired than the dishonorable vassal of Kaiser. We as a part of this Nation from its foundation, we who have marched under the Nation's flag in all its battles, say "Amen" to this decree. Some are "over there," others are in training, while others are waiting the call, with sleeves uprolled, shirt collars unbuttoned, and feet prancing for the march. Democracy, like running lightning, is playing on the vision of man. Something charming in the name. For 300 years we have prayed long, labored, and waited for real democracy. God is answering us and we accept the answer, though it comes through perils of war in a strange land.

Other men are dying who see only the shadow of oppression; we have been grievously tormented under the oppression they dread. Together we fight, together we die, together we must triumph, or together we fail. Kaiser's rod knows no color, race, or creed.

While the cannon roar, smoke envelops armies; while nations are locked in arms and their brave men are dying; while the only son of a sad but patriotic father stands between his country and autocratic invasion; while the young father gives his life for the success of his country and the freedom of his child, we ask that democracy, for which four-fifths of the world is fighting, be made clear to all men. Colored people are looking for real democracy and nothing but real democracy.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

RETENTION OF UNIFORMS.

R. 13366) permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

SALARIES OF FEDERAL JUDGES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives requesting the return of the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, codify, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be returned to the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS FOR PEACE.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senate, I ask the privilege of submitting a few observations in relation to the resolution that I introduced not long ago, which I ask to have read from the desk.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that the Senator desires to have it read simply in connection with his remarks and not for action?

Mr. KNOX. Only in connection with my observations.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 361) submitted by Mr. KNOX December 3, 1918, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the United States of America entered the war with Germany and Austria-Hungary in order to vindicate the ancient rights of navigation as established under international law and in order to remove forever the German menace to our peace; and

Whereas the splendid effort of the American people and the valor of our soldiers and sailors during a year and a half, when added to the enormous sacrifices, the steadfast fortitude, and the noble courage displayed by our allies during more than four years, have made possible the attainment of those aims, now best expressed as restitution, reparation, and guaranties against the German menace; and

Whereas the surrender of Germany and Austria-Hungary to the terms of the armistice has attained a great part, and has rendered enforceable the remainder of those aims; and

Whereas conferences are about to take place with the purpose to complete, to perfect, and to guarantee the attainment of the war aims aforesaid and thus to pass to the state of formal peace: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the purposes of the United States of America in those conferences should be confined to the aforesaid aims and matters germane thereto.

Second. That for the safeguarding of those aims the first essential is a definite understanding that the same necessity arising in the future there shall be the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization.

Third. That any project for any general league of nations or for any sweeping change in the ancient laws of the sea as hitherto recognized as international law and violated by the Teutonic powers should be postponed for separate consideration, if and when at some future time general conferences on those subjects might be deemed useful.

Resolved further, That immediately upon compliance with the terms of the armistice and the guaranteed attainment of the war aims as aforesaid, the Army and Navy of the United States should be withdrawn from foreign territories and waters except in so far as their retention might be temporarily necessary to establish the status contemplated by the armistice; and further that the extraordinary powers conferred upon the President for the prosecution of the war should be withdrawn and the country restored to a normal condition of peace with the greatest possible celerity consistent with the national interest.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, in addressing the Senate on October 28, in presenting the resolution of December 3, and in the remarks I now wish to make upon the subject of that resolution I am actuated by the conviction that the great national policies involved in the diplomatic closing of the state of war and in the conditions under which this Nation is to pass to the state of peace and to face the future are matters upon which the Senate and, indeed, the whole Congress of the United States should, through thorough discussion, reach a clear crystallization of their views upon the basis of the calm thought and the conscience of the American people. It is upon this necessity of full discussion, rather than advocacy of a particular program, that I wish, first of all, to dwell. But since a definite formulation of views is the best basis for practical discussion, I shall endeavor to put before the Senate some quite definite considerations.

For the fact that "the surrender of Germany and Austria-Hungary to the terms of the armistice has attained a great part, and has rendered enforcible the remainder of our war aims," we have the testimony of the President, who on November 11 read to Congress the terms of armistice signed by the enemy, and, having done so, said:

> The war thus comes to an end; for having accepted these terms of armistice, it will be impossible for the German command to renew it.

Continuing, he said war "is at an end," and then added:

> We know, too, that the object of the war is attained; the object upon which all free men had set their hearts; and attained with a sweeping completeness which even now we do not realize.

Further on he also said:

> The arbitrary power of the military caste of Germany, which once could secretly and of its own single choice disturb the peace of the world, is discredited and destroyed.

These statements as to the results already accomplished the President repeated with equal emphasis in his address to Congress on December 2.

It is clear, then, that our attention should now be directed to the enforcement of the remainder of our war aims, now best expressed as restitution, reparation, and guaranties; and to the purpose to complete, to perfect, and to guarantee those aims as we pass to the state of formal peace. (I use again the language of the resolution of December 3.)

The definite problem of formally ending the war is: By what measures as to "restitution, reparation, and guaranties" shall we assure that the war now won shall stay won; that the menace now removed shall stay forever removed. Germane, in a broad sense, is the question by what measures of safeguard we may make the recurrence of any similar menace in the future most improbable. Germane too, in this broad sense, are certain of the questions of the conditions under which the United States is to face the future; certain questions, but not all questions. We must guard against too great amplification just here.

Restitution becomes an accomplished fact with the evacuation of invaded territories and the definitive return to France of Alsace-Lorraine. The principle of restitution, applied to Germany's enforced relinquishment of political and economic means of aggrandizement in Russia, Roumania, Turkey, and elsewhere, extends into the field of measures to guarantee the world against a revival of the menace of Teutonic dominion.

Reparation is a matter of arithmetic, of law, and of equitable justice. In other aspects it also extends into the conception of practical, in contradistinction to paper, guaranties for the future. In this view it is not improper to consider whether the imposition of excessively onerous money payments might not have the effect of either a desperation favorable to anarchy or else a necessity to allow Germany great foreign-trade facilities (if indeed she can find customers for her goods) in order that she might produce the wealth required for vast indemnities. The latter alternative might in the long run have the result of forcing economic aggrandizement upon a people who, we have seen, can not now be safely intrusted with great power in the world. This war must be a lesson to Germans and to all who may ever think of emulating them. It occurs to me that to demand the cancellation of the German internal bonded war debt and the allocation of that sum to the funds for the indemnities of restoration, and so forth, might possibly be considered. Such a scheme would appear to punish the people who financed a villainous war in a way that they would be slow to forget.

As to guaranties, the condition of relative impotence in the face of the preponderant power of the allies to which Germany has been reduced by the terms of the armistice is, of course, the first of our real guaranties. The maintenance of that condition during a long period of repentance, probation, and expiation for the years of horror into which the Teutonic peoples plunged the world is the first of real guaranties against the recrudescence of any similar German menace.

As part of this guaranty for the future, as well as for the sake of humanity and the interest of the peoples affected, it seems entirely clear that her colonies should not be returned to Germany, but should either be divided among the chief belligerents or else jointly held by them, with their respective authority somewhat proportioned to their respective local interests and to their position as factors in victory. In either case the allies could determine and apportion such share of raw materials from their tropical and other territories as they found convenient after supplying their own requirements and having in view to give Germany the means of subsistence but not the means of aggrandizement.

The setting up of new free states as a cordon to cut off for the future the "Mittel Europa" and Near Eastern dream of founding Teutonic world dominion is in this respect another practical measure in the broad conception of real guaranties for the future. The effectiveness of this last-named form of guaranty against the Germanic menace may well call, from time to time, not only for measures to secure the external durability of those newly created states as against a powerful nation such as Germany, but also for measures to maintain safe conditions within and as between the new states in question. Thus it is true that even while we confine ourselves to what is broadly but no less really germane to our war aims, we are carried far afield, and we look for limits to the obligations which America could wisely share with Europe.

Here is the road we have traveled. The United States of America slowly, but in the end very clearly, perceived that a menace of Europe by the dominion of aggressive military power was in this nineteenth century a menace also to the safety of this Nation. America manifested this perception by throwing its entire power into the scales to join in the suppression of that menace of Europe by military imperialism.

Can we not perceive emerging from these facts a new American doctrine? I will state this great new doctrine in these words: If a situation should arise in which any power or combination of powers should, directly or indirectly, menace the freedom and peace of Europe, the United States would regard such situation with grave concern as a menace to its own freedom and peace and would consult with other powers affected with a view to concerted action for the removal of such menace.

If this had been the avowed and understood policy of the United States before July, 1914, it is, in my judgment, very improbable that the war would have occurred. When at length the United States had perceived and had acted upon this policy with mighty effect the war entered on its last and victorious phase. America has now perceived and manifested its perception of the principle of this policy. It has put this policy to successful test. Avowed by public official declaration, it might prove worthy, I believe, to serve with the Monroe doctrine as a fundamental doctrine of American diplomacy. It entangles us in no way, but it makes us the potential ally of the defenders of liberty whenever a great menace shall arise.

When the British statesman Canning saw that the aggressive designs against the Western Hemisphere that were cherished by certain powers were capable of a repercussion likely to menace the European situation, the Monroe doctrine arose to ward off that menace (as well as to secure American safety). The Monroe doctrine, with virtual European sanction, and especially with British sanction, serves its purposes well. It would, I think, be sure of British support if it were menaced. But the Monroe doctrine leaves to the United States the mandate that it carries, and it is for the United States to do what need be done to maintain safe conditions within and as between the Republics of this hemisphere in connection with our predominant interest in their external durability as against an aggressive power from without.

There is a certain analogy between this and what would be a corollary to the doctrine now suggested, as it would touch the question of our obligation in the matter of new States now being raised up in Europe. The corollary would be that if such new States were menaced as part of a general European danger then the United States would be concerned; but that what need be done to maintain safe conditions within, or as between them, would be primarily a European concern and a European obligation in the discharge of which we need take no part. And this is as it should be. There is no need that American troops should travel thousands of miles for any other purpose than to ward off a menace to vital American interests.

The doctrine which I propose would seem to embody a simple and safe basis for that "definite understanding that, the same necessity arising in the future, there shall be the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization" as was effective in this case, and which is "the first essential for the safeguarding of our war aims," to use the language of the resolution of December 3.

That resolution next records the opinion that—> any project for any general league of nations, or for any sweeping change in the ancient laws of the sea as hitherto recognized as international law and violated by the Teutonic powers should be postponed for separate consideration not alone by the victorious belligerents but by all the nations, if and when at some future time general conferences on those subjects might be deemed useful.

Let me turn now to the resolution's recommendation that no project for any general league of nations should be dragged into the peace negotiations. As I have previously had occasion to remark, an act of Congress of August, 1916, authorized and requested the President to call a conference of the nations on the subjects of the arbitration of international disputes and gradual disarmament of the nations. The representation of this country was to consist of 10 delegates, eminent in the law and for loyalty, who were to report back their conclusions to their own Government. It was requested that the conference should be called not later than at the close of the war. An appropriation of $200,000 was voted for the purpose. If any such subject is to be taken up, we have here authoritative recommendation by the Congress for its separate consideration.

The object of my resolution is not to condemn in advance any league of nations—and least of all the existing entente, or a permanent understanding of all the English-speaking peoples—of a kind that might in time commend itself to the considered judgment of the American people. The object of my resolution is simply to postpone the larger and very disputable question of some comprehensive league of nations for that separate and very deliberate consideration that its nature demands and that an act of Congress has already sanctioned.

After all, why such hurry? If a league of nations is a good thing, surely its merit will be the better appreciated after careful study. If the debate that preceded our Declaration of Independence raged for almost a decade before the Revolution; if the debate over the meaning of the Constitution as to the powers of the Nation and the rights of the States lasted for generations and is not yet ended; if a single phase of the debate over State and National rights occupied years, culminating in the immortal intellectual combat between Stephen A. Douglas and Abraham Lincoln; if every great question in every free country has required a long period of discussion and thought before the people could reach a conclusion upon it, should not this, one of the biggest, deepest, and most far-reaching proposals ever made to the American people, also receive careful and extended public examination before the people are called upon to render their verdict?

If a league of nations may not be a good thing, certainly the agitated days following a great war should not be seized upon to saddle the country with a policy it has not examined and which is no necessary part of the making of peace.

I, for one, am entirely ignorant of what the President means by a league of nations. The American people do not know. Our judgments must to-day be hypothetical. Conceptions of a league of nations range from a sort of world republic to a mere entente for certain purposes of the United States and our chief allies—something that need not necessarily cause alarm.

Some people speak of an international order founded upon justice and good faith as necessarily the antithesis of an international order founded upon power. The victorious allies have in this war placed invincible power at the service of justice and good faith. We have seen the glorious result. Where would justice and good faith and civilization be to-day if those powers had not leagued together to vindicate them? Are justice and good faith so sure to prevail in a heterogeneous, experimental league of all nations, hastily created now, that we are ready to surrender our national conscience to such a league? Can we create a league with a purer conscience or higher ideals than the one called into existence by the German attack? Wise policy, as opposed to shallow empiricism, would seem to counsel us to solidify and build upon what we have tried rather than to plunge headlong into a universal experiment.

Nor can we nurse every backward nation. The most we can do is to strive to give favorable opportunity to evolution. It may be that we shall have to guard against letting the phrase "self-determination of peoples" quite run away with us. Is the phrase always sure to possess an absolute merit that it lacked, for example, in America in the sixties?

One danger to the country is the extreme radical, the progressive who demands the millenium here and now and who is very intolerant of the views of others who may differ from him as to ways and means. The coequal danger is the danger of reactionarism. The path for America's true progress lies through the middle ground of a wise and sound liberalism. That middle ground has been vacated often by the political leadership of the day. I appeal particularly to Senators on this side and to Republicans generally to occupy and make their own that middle ground of constructive, wisely progressive, modernized policy that is called for by these great days. And I know that many of my Democratic colleagues feel this same appeal.

The discussion of a league of nations reveals two tendencies of thought, both of which seem to me to be dangerous, the one premature and the other out of date. One set of proponents of the league of nations idea in an extreme form seem to argue that a league of nations must be a universal one and must be made at once in order that the difficult geographical, ethnographical, economic, and other questions arising out of the war may be settled by it. Strange idea! The practicability of such a league in any thoroughgoing sense is, to say the least, most doubtful, if indeed it be not altogether chimerical at this period of civilization. Yet some advocates of that ideal would create their league offhand and would instantly confront it with vast problems of the utmost difficulty. Any league would be designed to prevent violent disturbances of the international status quo and to further adjustments and developments carefully worked out to foster an evolution along just, humane, and honorable lines, in the hope of forestalling those tensions between evenly balanced powers that make possible the most horrible wars. Not fiat, but higher civilization, will bring the millennium nearer.

We have now passed from a dangerous balance of power to a beneficent preponderance of power in the hands of the proved trustees of civilization. The English-speaking people and our principal allies formed a real league and they have enforced peace and saved civilization. This league we have stands ready to enforce the conditions of peace.

It may be doubtful whether we need any international courts in addition to the rusting machinery of The Hague tribunal. It may be doubtful whether we desire more comprehensive arbitration treaties than those negotiated with Great Britain and France in 1912. The text of that treaty shows a way in which great powers might safeguard their mutual peace in case of any mutual dispute. For the rest, an entente of those powers, with their preponderant power on sea, in air, and in the economic field, can stand ready, in their wise discretion, to take measures together, when they believe it their duty to do so, if the peace of the world is seriously threatened from any other quarter.

A universal league of nations which should be the arbiter of the international rights of each nation, if it were democratic—that is, based on world majority rule according to populations—or if it were based upon a formula taking both sovereignties and populations into account, would have the power to impose upon the peoples most advanced in honor, justice, truth, enlightenment, and humanity—that is, in civilization—the judgment and the verdict of peoples less advanced.

Now, the conscience and temper of the American people, as we have just seen in this war, can impose upon them a great international task even without any treaty obligation to assume that task. Unless impelled by their own conscience and judgment it is more than doubtful whether any treaty could drive this nation to a foreign war. Is it not better, then, that the obligation we assume should depend upon our own judgment and the conscience of the English-speaking peoples and our present allies, rather than upon the judgment of some vast world league?

As to any practicable league, it must be fostered by the creation of a community of interest in peace and justice and good faith. Upon just this principle of the creation of community of interest, of self-interest in peace and welfare, rested the six-power policy in China which was so unthinkingly wrecked in 1913. Upon the same principle rested the "dollar diplomacy" that succeeded in bringing an unusual degree of peace and prosperity to the turbulent countries of the Caribbean Sea. If we perfect our diplomacy, with due practical regard to this common-sense principle, we shall enable it, I hope, by the gradual extension of the same principle to render great service to the world at large. Power in the hands of the defenders of civilization holds the best promise of an ultimate international order founded upon justice and good will, which all good men long to see.

Whether the question of some kind of league of nations shall really come before the Senate in connection with the peace negotiations, and, if so, in what form, is a matter involving the policy of our allies, as to which we are not yet enlightened. But we shall not waste our time if we now consider some of these possibilities, even in a form necessarily hypothetical.

Let us suppose, for example, that there should be proposed a permanent entente of the English-speaking peoples and of the French, Italians, and Japanese to enforce this peace; to consult together whenever peace was anywhere threatened, with a view to endeavor to maintain peace; to cooperate economically, each recognizing the other's leadership in its peculiar field, and to form a permanent committee for consultation on these subjects.

The question would then arise as to whether the United States should for general purposes join in or remain outside of such an entente. I think the day has gone by for the rejection on principle of any close association of this Government with governments of other countries. To dogmatize against any possible entente under any possible circumstances would be almost as unreasonable as to wish to rush headlong into some Utopian world league.

Washington referred to a "detached and distant situation" that no longer exists, as all know. He referred to the danger of a weak nation's becoming entangled with a powerful one. The questions we are considering will have to be decided by the application of present wisdom to present conditions, not by the easy misapplication of old wisdom to entirely new conditions.

Emerson truly said that—

> Every law and usage was a man's expedient to meet a particular case; that they are all imitable, all alterable; we may make as good; we may make better.

With Britain dominant in the regions of India and the Near East and vastly interested in Africa; with Japan preeminently interested in the Far East; with France and Italy possessing acknowledged special interests in the Mediterranean; with the sphere of the United States conformed primarily to the regions affected by the Monroe doctrine, the relations of these powers afford excellent opportunity for mutual recognition of special interests and for honest mutual cooperation in sane economic and diplomatic policies. With their own accord safeguarded, it might be possible for such a group of nations to serve the world and the cause of peace and of civilization in a fashion to gratify all those who pursue a policy and not a fetish.

Suppose that it were proposed that the United States should bind itself in advance by treaty to go to war in given circumstances. Under the Constitution war can be declared only by the Congress. How could the President, by negotiating a treaty, and the Senate, by consenting to its ratification, bind this country to declare war? A declaration of war is, under the Constitution, a prerogative of the Congress. The appropriations to initiate or to conduct war are in the discretion of the Congress.

The Senate has always been jealous of its treaty-making function. When arbitration treaties have been before it, the Senate has steadily refused to consent to a treaty for the arbitration even of justiciable questions, except in a form that would reserve to it the right to say yes or no to the question of the fitness for arbitration of each specific issue that might arise under any such general treaty.

How, then, could a President of the United States, even in conjunction with the Senate as a part of the treaty-making power, bind in advance the Congress of the United States to vacate its predecision, under the Constitution, of future questions of declaring or not declaring war; nay, more, to surrender to foreign nations their constitutional right to make that decision whenever it arises? Might not the annulment of so important a check upon war-making dangerously diminish the people's rightful control over that most momentous step—the declaration of war? I put this question merely in passing. It is one of many we have to consider; but it is the larger questions which now cry loudest for our earnest thought.

As between the proposition contained in my resolution that there should be a definite understanding for cooperation to defend civilization should the same necessity arise as gave cause for the late war on the one hand and the project of a supergovernment by some league of nations on the other hand, I quote from a series of lectures delivered at Oxford some years ago by W. A. Phillips, M. A.—

> but it is none the less true that the new holy alliance, of which the pacifists dream, would be faced by very much the same problems as those which confronted Alexander and his allies. They, too, proposed to establish their international system on the principle of the preservation of the status quo—indeed, there is no other practical principle conceivable; they, too, would apply the principles of the Troppau protocol, by empowering the universal union, in the event of any State violating or threatening to violate the public law of the world, to bring it to reason "by peaceful means, or if need be by arms." Now, it might be possible that, as Sir Frederick Pollock points out, "contests for supremacy or predominant influence," which in their very nature can not be "disposed of by argument," might be effectually prevented by a coalition of powers of superior collective strength which "should be prepared to enforce the principles which now stand unanimously acknowledged by the second peace conference of The Hague."
> This would, in effect, be to apply the principle which the grand alliance directed against France, that of a coalition ad hoc. But if an attempt were made to expand this coalition into "a universal union" and to base its action not on the exigencies of circumstances as they arise, not on the particular joint interests recognized by all the parties to it, but on the general right of the world organization to coerce its refractory members, what becomes of the sovereign independence of nations? Especially it would be the small States whose independence would be prejudiced; for though international law recognizes in theory the equality of all sovereign States, no international system which should attempt to translate this theory into practice would survive. If, on the other hand, the voting power of the central "directory" were to be proportioned to the size and importance of its constituent States, the result would be precisely such a hegemony of the great powers as was exercised by the grand alliance after 1815. Nor is it extravagant to suppose that the new holy alliance, thus constituted, would develop, mutatis mutandis, very much on the lines of the old. It would begin by repudiating the principle of intervention in the internal affairs of the constituent nations, only in the end to find itself compelled to intervene; for, in new forms, the old difficulty of drawing a sharp distinction between external affairs and "internal affairs having an external effect" would be sure to emerge.
> The truth is, to cite Sir Frederick Pollock once more, that the effective working of an international federal system demands a far greater uniformity of political institutions and ideas among the nations of the world than at present exists. This truth was realized by the sovereigns and statesmen of the Holy Alliance, and they attempted to secure the necessary uniformity by forcing their own model on the European States, not primarily in the interests of despotism but in the supposed interests of the general peace of society. It has quite recently received a fresh and striking illustration in the attitude of President Wilson toward the revolution in Mexico and similar conditions in other Latin American States, an attitude developed logically out of the assumption by the United States, under the Monroe doctrine, of the duty of policing the Americas. Like the signatory powers of the Troppau protocol, he too demands "guaranties of legal stability and order" before he will recognize a de facto government; like them, he proposes to reconcile the guilty State to his system "by peaceful means or, if need be, by arms"; he differs from them only in his conception of what constitutes the guaranty required. The sovereigns of the Holy Alliance found this in the submission of the peoples to their governments ab antiquo; by President Wilson it is assumed to depend upon the will of the people "properly expressed and registered."
> From the point of view of our present inquiry it matters not which conception of "legitimacy" be the more reasonable. The important thing is that for any international organization, whether dominated by a group of powers or by a single power, a certain uniformity of political system is essential, and that sooner or later this uniformity would be enforced by armed intervention. The moment of such intervention, moreover, will be determined always by the interests of the dominating power or powers. "This abyss of iniquities which we call politics," wrote the beautiful and unhappy Empress Elizabeth of Russia in 1817, "is vainly covered with a tissue of brilliant phrases, since it is easy for anyone of the least intelligence, whose heart is in the right place, to see through this tissue and recognize that, in spite of evangelical treaties, in spite of the reign of justice, it is always the weaker who are sacrificed to the interests of the more powerful." This was true enough when it was spoken; is there any reason to suppose that it is less true of the present age, or will be less true of the age to come?

These wise words remind us of the antiquity of the ideal of a league of nations to bring the blessings of sure and universal peace otherwise than through the slow amelioration of the heart and thought of man, the slow growth of a finer public opinion, and the maintenance, meanwhile, of a vigilant preparedness to defend one's right. Some of the league of nations enthusiasts have referred to those who would look before we leap as being men who look backward. The truth is that these Utopians have looked backward for every idea they now so enthusiastically flash before the public eye. Their every idea and aspiration is as old as the Amphictyonic League, the "Grand Design" of Henry IV, the Holy Alliance of Alexander I. They have not coined a new phrase; they have coined a new human nature, and that coinage is to be scrutinized in the light of history. It did not pass in the past. Have we sound reason to believe it a safe currency to-day?

So long as you have national consciousness, so long will a nation fight for its life just as an individual will do if life is deemed more desirable than death. Even the most optimistic do not pretend to the blotting out of all war, even occasional civil war, but only to the lessening of international war, by international action. And even the forcible prevention or just decision of all international war, wherever and however arising, by a league of nations of which the United States was a member would presuppose the sending of American troops thousands of miles for some distant purpose perhaps of no great concern to American citizens. However small the force we sent, still some one's sons would be asked to die for a far-away cause of rather academic appearance.

I do not believe the American people would approve such an exigency. I should not wish to see this country signatory to an agreement which the American people would be likely to repudiate if put to the test. I should not vote for any treaty that subjected this Nation's judgment and conscience as to its vital interests or its war-making prerogative to the will of a foreign majority.

I think the American people—North, South, East, and West—believe in Americanism. I think they believe in nationalism as an instrument for good. I do not for one moment believe they would be willing to see this country ordered about by a heterogeneous world league of all nations. I do not think that, when they come to study the subject, they will be willing to go farther than a policy of nationalism a little mitigated and accommodated to a judicious and limited accord upon certain common mutual concerns, especially if that accord be first of all an accord of the English-speaking peoples, and, as it now is in fact, with our principal great allies for the firm enforcement of our war aims.

Bacon said, "As for the philosophers, they make imaginary laws for imaginary commonwealths, and their discourses are as the stars, which give little light because they are so high." As the Holy Alliance was falling apart Canning wrote with a very human breeziness, "Things are getting back to a wholesome state again. Every nation for itself and God for us all." Between dangerous pursuit of the ignis fatuus of the theorists and a stubborn reversion to the cynicism and selfishness of that intense national individualism which admits no duty to the society of nations there is a middle ground. There, I think, this great country should take its stand. Both within nations and as between nations this is the day of individualism modified by social consciousness. The problem is to sacrifice neither of those necessities to a high civilization, national and international.

If it prove wise for the United States to enter some definite entente, well and good, provided it be a small and natural one, bringing only limited and appropriate obligations. Any "league of nations" should await future exhaustive consideration. As I have already suggested, even without an entente, except for the unfinished business of enforcing and insuring our war aims, the United States can, without any "entanglement" whatever, place in advance at the service of the world's peace, if seriously threatened, the whole of its influence and of its potential power. This can be done, as I said, by a new declaration of some correspondence to the Monroe doctrine—a declaration that a menace to the liberty of Europe is a menace to America, and that America will consult her friends and prepare for action if ever such menace shall again arise.

I have said enough, I hope, to make this much clear:

First. That the issues of the war were issues between the central powers and the allies and ourselves. The function of a peace treaty is to settle those issues.

Second. The issues as to a league of nations and a revision of the laws of the seas are issues between the allies themselves and between them and each of them and all of the neutral powers.

Third. I have shown conclusively that upon these latter issues there exist the widest diversity of opinion, and I have concluded that it is wise not to force upon a conference that must adjust the comparatively simple demands of the one the complexities and confusions of the other.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I had no intention of discussing the subject the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has just so ably presented. I had reason to believe that it would not be discussed to-day. I feel, however, that in view of the fact that this resolution is under consideration by the Foreign Relations Committee and possibly would have been acted upon to-day at its meeting had not its determination been put over until Saturday, the speech of the Senator would have been answered by the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I am unwilling as a member of that committee to permit the view announced by the Senator from Pennsylvania to be considered for one moment as an expression of the view held by me as a member of that committee or even of a majority of the committee, because I am confident the committee will report adversely upon the resolution.

I regret that the Senator from Pennsylvania in the circumstances did not see fit to make his very able address after the Committee on Foreign Relations had had an opportunity of reporting on the resolution on the coming Saturday. At that time the resolution may be debated by those who are in favor of it and those who are against it, or possibly the resolution may be by the committee framed in a less obnoxious form.

I simply want to call attention to the fact that the resolution does not express the sentiments, in my opinion, of the Committee on Foreign Relations or the Senate, and certainly not the aspirations of the people of this country. The speech of the Senator with regard to a league of nations may or may not express the sentiments of this body; it may or may not express the sentiments of the people of this country; but of this I am sure—his resolution does not. The resolution has had no emphasis in the speech of the Senator. I desire to call attention to it. I call attention to the first "whereas":

> Whereas the United States of America entered the war with Germany and Austria-Hungary in order to vindicate the ancient rights of navigation as established under international law and in order to remove forever the German menace to our peace.

I think that is a very unhappy and incomplete description of the causes that forced the United States into this war. I would dislike for the world to believe that such were the sole causes for our Government entering the war. Did we enter into this war for the pure and sole purpose of defending laws of navigation upon the high seas? Did we enter into this war solely to support some theory of international law, no matter how just? Yet the reading of the resolution that the Senator asks this body to adopt may be subject to that construction.

Not satisfied with such unhappy statement of the causes of war, in the second "Whereas" of his resolution, which is the foundation for his speech and for the suggested action of the Senate, he says:

> Whereas the splendid effort of the American people and the valor of our soldiers and sailors during a year and a half, when added to the enormous sacrifices, the steadfast fortitude, and the noble courage displayed by our allies during more than four years, have made possible the attainment of those aims, now best expressed as restitution, reparation, and guaranties against the German menace.

Do we desire no guaranties against any other menace than German that may arise in the future? Having abated one epidemic, are we to make no preparations against another and different epidemic? Are those all the aims of this Government? Are those the sole aims of the American people? Yet the Senator says that those are the sole aims; in other words, according to the resolution the sole aim of the American people in this war is to sustain the right of navigation as established under international laws and to forever remove the German menace to our own peace.

I take it that the Members of this body have a higher conception of our peace aims. That which directly forced us into this war is one thing and that which we hope to derive from the peace agreement is another thing. The Senator from Pennsylvania is confusing in the minds of the people of this country and of the world the distinction between the causes for entering the war and the aspiration of a nation in making peace.

We entered the war because war was forced on us, because our rights were trampled on, because we were insulted, because civilization was threatened, because we would have deserved the ignominy of the world if we had not entered the war. But after entering the war, did we have no aspirations when peace would come other than restitution, indemnities, and the destruction of the German military power? Are we perfectly satisfied to end the war and have another war come the next year or the year after that? Do our aspirations for peace embrace no hope whatever of a lasting peace? Yet there is nothing in the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania that breathes the spirit of a hope that the President of the United States has announced and that lives in the souls of the American people.

Do you think for one moment that the great spirit which inspired our magnificent Army to die by thousands upon the battle field was solely that of fear of German menace or desire for revenge? Do you not know that every soldier who, in his young manhood, in the bright years of his life, when hope was in his bosom, marched to certain death was sustained in that hour by the knowledge that he was giving his life for a better country, for a better world, and so that those who would follow him might not suffer what fate had compelled him to suffer?

The Senator from Pennsylvania states the cause of the war. How did the President of the United States state the cause of this war in his war message? He says:

> The new policy has swept every restriction aside. Vessels of every kind, whatever their flag, their character, their cargo, their destination, their errand, have been ruthlessly sent to the bottom without warning and without thought of help or mercy for those on board, the vessels of friendly neutrals along with those of belligerents. Even hospital ships and ships carrying relief to the sorely bereaved and stricken people of Belgium, though the latter were provided with safe conduct through the proscribed areas by the German Government itself and were distinguished by unmistakable marks of identity, have been sunk with the same reckless lack of compassion or of principle.
> I was for a little while unable to believe that such things would in fact be done by any government that had hitherto subscribed to the humane practices of civilized nations. International law had its origin in the attempt to set up some law which would be respected and observed upon the seas, where no nation had right of dominion and where lay the free highways of the world. By painful stage after stage has that law been built up, with meager enough results, indeed, after all was accomplished that could be accomplished, but always with a clear view, at least, of what the heart and conscience of mankind demanded. This minimum of right the German Government has swept aside under the plea of retaliation and necessity and because it had no weapons which it could use at sea except these which it is impossible to employ as it is employing them without throwing to the winds all scruples of humanity or of respect for the understandings that were supposed to underlie the intercourse of the world. I am not now thinking of the loss of property involved, immense and serious as that is, but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of noncombatants—men, women, and children—engaged in pursuits which have always, even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate. Property can be paid for; the lives of peaceful and innocent people can not be. The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind.
> It is a war against all nations. American ships have been sunk, American lives taken, in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way.

Compare that statement of the causes urging this Government to enter the war, and the bare, cold, brutal, technical statement urged by the Senator from Pennsylvania, which he asks this body to express as the causes that moved this country to enter the war.

Again, the President in the same message says:

> The German Government denies the right of neutrals to use arms at all within the areas of the sea which it has proscribed, even in the defense of rights which no modern publicist has ever before questioned their right to defend.

And the causes that Congress knew so well were again enumerated by the President in his Flag Day address at Washington on June 14, 1917, when he said:

> They filled our unsuspecting communities with vicious spies and conspirators and sought to corrupt the opinion of our people in their own behalf. When they found that they could not do that, their agents diligently spread sedition amongst us and sought to draw our own citizens from their allegiance—and some of those agents were men connected with the official embassy of the German Government itself here in our own Capital. They sought by violence to destroy our industries and arrest our commerce. They tried to incite Mexico to take up arms against us, and to draw Japan into a hostile alliance with her—and that not by indirection but by direct suggestion from the foreign office in Berlin. They impudently denied us the use of the high seas and repeatedly executed their threat that they would send to their death any of our people who ventured to approach the coasts of Europe.

And, again, in his war message, the President said:

> There is one choice we can not make, we are incapable of making—we will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our Nation and our people to be ignored or violated. The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are no common wrongs; they cut to the very roots of human life.

Again, we find the President, in defining the causes that forced us into this war taking the position that it was not alone the dispute over the right of navigation on the high seas but the right of nations to exist, and the right of peoples to govern themselves. He said:

> We are accepting this challenge of hostile purpose because we know that in such a government, following such methods, we can never have a friend; and that in the presence of its organized power, always lying in wait to accomplish we know not what purpose, there can be no assured security for the democratic governments of the world. We are now about to accept gauge of battle with this natural foe to liberty and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the Nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil or false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included; for the rights of nations great and small and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.

The Senator from Pennsylvania attemps in his resolution to state the aims of this Government. The aims of this Government, according to the Senator, were apparently solely to defeat and dictate terms of peace to Germany. We were to defeat Germany and we were to allow other peoples to accumulate the same forces for the purpose of precipitating upon the world the same devastation; we were to defeat Germany and then we were to desert Belgium; we were to defeat Germany and then we were to desert Serbia; we were to defeat Germany and then we were to desert the Armenians and the other helpless peoples who could not continue to maintain their independence without sustaining power. So the Senator's resolution may be construed. The President of the United States has never used expressions that might be so construed.

If the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to speak the voice of this Senate, if he desires to speak the voice of the American people, let him copy in his resolution, as the causes of this war, the statements made by the President of the United States which resulted in a unanimous vote for war; which was indorsed unanimously, not only by the Congress of the United States but by all the people of the United States. If the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to include in any resolution a pronouncement of the aims of this Government and of its people in the making of a peace, let him quote the language of the President of the United States and he will not only receive the approval of the Senate but he will receive the approval of all the people of this country. He does not speak them. He should know that he does not speak them. He should know that he does not speak the sentiments of the Foreign Relations Committee; he should know that he does not represent the sense of the United States Senate. Is it by reason of such fear he speaks ahead of time? This country, however, will know, and Europe will know, and the great statesmen who will listen to the sound of the President's voice throughout the world will know that the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania will not be adopted. They will know that he does not speak for the Congress nor for the American people.

Does any Senator doubt that the President spoke the sentiments of the American people when he said:

> Our object now, as then, is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power and to set up amongst the really free and self-governed peoples of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth insure the observance of those principles. Neutrality is no longer feasible or desirable where the peace of the world is involved and the freedom of its peoples, and the menace to that peace and freedom lies in the existence of autocratic governments backed by organized force which is controlled wholly by their will, not by the will of their people. We have seen the last of neutrality in such circumstances. We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrong done shall be observed among nations and their governments that are observed among the individual citizens of civilized states.

There are the aims of the people of the United States expressed by their President. Those are the objects that we seek in peace, no matter what may have been the causes of war. The cause of war might have been the firing upon an American ship, but the object of peace is not alone to sink the ship that sunk ours. The peace aims and aspirations of our people can not be circumscribed by any reasons that forced them into war. But before leaving the last expression of the President, may I call attention to the language in which he describes there a league of nations—> to set up amongst the really free and self-governed peoples of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth insure the observance of those principles.

The Senator from Pennsylvania speaks of a league of nations as though it were some corporation which each country must support with its money, which each Government must defend with its navy and with its army. Is there anything in any expression of the President of the United States from which that conclusion may be drawn? Is there no peaceful power behind a government that will enable it to punish wrongs? I say to you that the will, the determination, the attitude, the ostracism of the great civilized nations of the world of any criminal nation would have just as much power to drive it into the right channels as would all of the armies and navies of the world.

I am not arguing as to the character or kind of league of nations which should be instituted; the question has not come down to that. The President has not presented any particular form of a league of nations; no great statesman has presented any particular form of a league of nations; but that there shall be concerted action between the great nations of the world to prevent precipitate and thoughtless war is the aim and object of all. When that is the aim and object of all, when that is the hope of civilization, when that is the hope of the American people, why should any great statesman of America stand here and, with a cynicism that must obscure argument, attempt to create the impression that it is impossible for nations to act in concert in behalf of a lasting peace? Is it accomplishing any good? Is that advice to the President of any benefit to him? Is that advice to the peace conference of any benefit to it? Is there a statesman connected with the peace conference, if he has the love of peace in his heart, if he has the love of humanity in his soul, who would listen to the hopeless argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania that it is impossible for nations to act in concert to minimize the occurrence of war?

Throughout his whole speech is there a hopeful word? Then, why is it made? Does anyone appreciate advice which simply says, "You can not do this; you can not do that," and yet tells him nothing that he can do toward accomplishment of that which all of the people of the world want done? Is it not time for this useless—yes, this harmful—advice to cease to be given in the United States Senate? Do you not know that under the Constitution of the United States the President, and the President alone, has imposed on him the duty to negotiate peace? The Senate can not negotiate it. The President can not surrender or delegate this power; he himself must negotiate treaties.

Oh, but it is said that, under the Constitution, the Senate of the United States may advise with regard to treaties. Advise what? They can advise that the negotiations be undertaken, but they can not advise the negotiation, because there is but one negotiator. They may advise that a treaty be entered into of a certain kind or character, but the Senate of the United States has no constitutional authority to advise the President as to the method of conducting such negotiation.

The Senator from Pennsylvania does not attempt to advise the President as to whether or not there shall be a league of nations. It is true that he discourages the hope that there may be one; but he says to the President, "Take that question up at some future time." I say there is no constitutional authority for the Senate of the United States to advise the sole negotiator of this country with regard to the method that he shall adopt or the procedure he shall follow with regard to those negotiations. Not only is it useless, but it is an attempted usurpation of the authority that the people of this country have vested in the President as the sole negotiator of treaties.

We must know that the adoption of the resolution can do no good. Can it do harm? Yes; it can do harm. You ask how can it do harm. Lloyd George, representing England; Clemenceau, representing France; Orlando, representing Italy, might think when the President of the United States says to them that the people of this country are more interested in everlasting peace than in anything else in the world that he does not speak for the American people. That is one way in which it may do harm. There is no doubt that Orlando and Lloyd George and Clemenceau agree with the President that there should be a concert of action, but, if they are led to believe that this country is opposed to that action now, they may oppose the President now.

How can you settle upon peace without the effect of that settlement reaching far into the future? Can you conceive of it? France and Germany settled upon peace after the Franco-Prussian war, and Germany took Alsace-Lorraine. Even Germany thus knew that the time would come, even if it were hundreds of years off, when France would right that wrong and take back to her bosom her own people. You can not make a peace to-day that will not have its effect to-morrow; and yet the Senator from Pennsylvania, in his practical statesmanship, would like to decree that Germany surrender territory and pay indemnities, and that the peace settlement should be considered then consummated. How can you ever settle the question until all of the rights that have been brought into question by this war are justly and fairly settled? You have got to settle the rights of Poland; you have got to settle the rights of Belgium; you have got to settle, not only the rights of Italy, but the rights of the Jugo-Slavs; you have got to settle, not only the rights of Poland, but of the Czecho-Slovaks; you have got to settle the conflicting and intricate rights of all of these and other peoples; otherwise, the peace that you are declaring now is but the establishment of a cause for future wars.

Is not that sufficient reason for taking these questions up now? Would anybody for one moment say that we will make a peace with Germany, Austria, and Turkey, leaving out of consideration the rights of all of these peoples? And if we are trying to take into consideration the rights of all of these peoples who are involved, then it is solely on the ground of preventing future wars; and, if we are justified in doing this to prevent future wars, then we are justified in considering at this time a league of nations and every question that will minimize the occurrence of war in the future.

I think it is deplorable, I think it is the most unfortunate thing in the world, to hear a great statesman, a man who has been Secretary of State of this Government, one for whose opinions I, with all the rest of the Senate, have the very highest respect, devote his great talents to pessimism, to destruction, to obstruction, rather than to optimism, hope, and construction. Oh, if he should tell the President of the United States the character of concert of nations that would be accepted by him, if he would advise the President of the United States as to the character of a league of nations that would meet our constitutional requirements, if he should say to the President in these negotiations, "If you, Mr. President, will take this position, I believe that you can sustain it before all the world," ah, then the advice of the Senator from Pennsylvania would be of great benefit. He does not do that. He offers a resolution here which is destructive, which is obstructive, and which has not a word of construction in it. It is as cold as the North Pole. It is as barren of hope as hades. It is useful for no other purpose than the enjoyment of a technical discussion of the Constitution, while the souls of humanity weep for everlasting peace throughout the world.

I am not here to argue in favor of a league of nations. There is no league of nations proposed to-day. The President has not proposed it. He has proposed that there be a concert of action of these powers to prevent war in the future. That may be called a league of nations or an association of nations, or whatever it may be; and that question should be determined by the peace conference now. It should be determined while the brutal effects of war are fresh in the minds of the people of the world as well as those of statesmen. It should be determined now, when the necessity of concerted action is recognized.

The Senator says there was concerted action between these great allies. He says there was a league of nations between the allies and the United States that won this war. Yes; but that league of nations did not come into force and effect until the great moving cause that destroyed millions of human lives had gotten beyond the control of Governments. We want some such league of nations as that which won the war, but instead of having it to win wars, we want it to prevent wars. If nations may concert and league themselves together for the purpose of winning war, why in the name of reason can they not league themselves together for the purpose of preventing war?

The Senator's own argument has shown the possibility of it, and yet he finds a thousand little difficulties that may occur. He finds the same grounds for argument that anyone may find with regard to any great undertaking. When we entered this war some of our great statesmen said to the President: "You can not get your army to France; it is too late. You can not get them over there; you are not prepared to transport them, and when they get over there they will not be trained to fight." Was that not what they told the President and the country with the same pessimism and discouraging obstruction? These great statesmen said that the President was not prepared for war, that he was not prepared to take the men over there, and that they were not prepared to fight when they got there; but we got more than 2,000,000 men over there, and we got men there who were prepared to fight when they got there as no men ever fought, as all the world will admit to-day.

The same course is now apparently being pursued toward the President's efforts for a lasting peace. The President is trying to do something over there to-day, and they are busy here telling him what he can not do. Let the President alone. He knows more of constitutional and international law than even the great and distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. He has been in closer touch with all of the conditions in Europe than the Senator from Pennsylvania or any other Senator upon this floor. His heart, his soul, his reputation, his whole life are in this consummation. With that incentive, with that motive, with his knowledge, and with his power let him perform his constitutional functions, and this war will be ended with a peace that we will be just as proud of as we are proud of the victory that was attained by our soldiers.

Mr. President, I have here an editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer. While I realize that it is a Republican paper, it deals in a nonpartisan way with a nonpartisan subject, namely, a league of nations. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair). Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer of Wednesday, Dec. 18, 1918.]

THERE MUST BE A LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate is about to pass upon a resolution offered by Senator KNOX, of Pennsylvania. This resolution opposes the coupling of the league of nations proposition with the consideration of peace treaties. It would postpone the whole subject until some later time.

We have no hesitation in pronouncing the Knox resolution to be mischievous in the extreme. The Senator is trifling with a most important matter. He is erecting barriers in the pathway of permanent peace, or at least an effort to secure permanence. To reject the league of nations idea is to uphold militarism—the continuation of secret alliances; the maintenance of vast standing armies. Unless the nations that have suffered from the insane ambition of German despots are prepared to prevent a similar outbreak in future, there can be no safety.

The United States entered the war—more than a year late, to be sure, but we entered it—not only to defend our rights but to destroy autocracy. To use the well-known phrase of the President, we wished to "make the world safe for democracy." We can not insist upon making the world safe for democracy unless we give of our best to bring it about. We can not stand aloof and leave it for other nations to do. That would be a selfish position to occupy. We can not trust our security to others. We must have a hand in world events. Unless we bear our full share of the burden and unless we join in a league to enforce peace, we shall see a return to old methods. Triple alliances and triple ententes and balances of power schemes have proved futile. The only safe organization is that of the important nations welded together with a determination to act in unity against any nation that shall hereafter attempt to start a world upheaval.

The time to enter into such an association is right now. A league of nations is the corner stone of peace settlements. With a league there can be a genuine reduction of standing armies. Without a league there can be no assurance of radical disarmament. Mere treaties can not be relied upon. Germany has proved the worthlessness of pledges when pledges stand in the way of inordinate ambition. Navies must be kept up. They are largely defensive in nature. Neither England nor the United States would consent to a reduction of naval strength. But the pure militarism of vast armies trained for the definite purpose of menace can and should be restricted. But they will not be unless the treaties of peace are founded upon a league that will see to it that they are.

We do not pretend to say that war positively can be prevented, but we do insist that a league of nations offers the most promising preventive. What is more, we assert our belief that if there is to be such an organization, it should be created—not at some indefinite time in the future, but before the peace terms are written into treaties.

Senator KNOX'S resolution is obstructive, and we have no patience with it.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on yesterday, toward the close of the day, we reached the subject of tax on employment of child labor, and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] asked that it go over until to-day. I suggest that we take up that subject first for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done.

The SECRETARY. On page 244, after line 14, it is proposed to insert the following: "Title XII.—Tax on employment of child labor."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been stated heretofore.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to address the Senate at any length on this question, nor to do anything except to make an earnest appeal to Senators who are about to vote on a great question.

Some time ago—in 1916, I think—the Senate passed a bill, in the identical language of this amendment, undertaking to prohibit the transportation of the products of child labor through the channels of interstate commerce. At that time several Senators, including myself, made an earnest appeal to the Senate not to enact the proposition, because we contended that it was a clear violation of the reserved rights and powers of the several States. The Senate was patient with us, and heard us at length on the question. The matter was thoroughly debated and thoroughly thrashed out. I think the proposition was well argued from both standpoints; but it was the judgment of the Senate that the bill which had already passed the House of Representatives was constitutional and valid and ought to become the law of the land. Consequently, the bill passed, was signed by the President, and went to the Supreme Court of the United States finally for test, because some citizen of North Carolina, when an effort was made to enforce the law against him, urged that it was invalid and unconstitutional, and carried the question to the courts. When it reached the Supreme Court of the United States that court, in a well-considered opinion that I will incorporate in my remarks, decided that it was invalid and unconstitutional; that the Federal Government had no right and no power to prescribe what should be the hours of labor and the terms of employment of the citizens of the several States within the limits of those States, respectively.

Mr. President, the question was fairly raised, and it was fairly decided. The power of Congress was denied in toto by the highest court of our land in regard to this proposition. Now we are presented with exactly the same proposition, and in no different manner, except that it is proposed that Congress shall do what the Supreme Court of the United States had decided we had no right even to touch, by means of a tax levy on the products of this particular kind of labor, instead of as a regulation of interstate commerce.

I am very well aware of the decisions—if I had known certainly that this matter would be up here this morning I would be prepared to lay them before the Senate—with respect to the oleomargarine matter, and with respect to the tax on State banks; but it must be remembered that neither one of those decisions, when they are carefully understood and when they are carefully analyzed, involves the proposition that in levying the tax Congress undertook indirectly to act without regard to other provisions of the Constitution and to assert a control over the domestic and internal affairs of a State by the use of taxation. That was not true about the oleomargarine proposition. There the confessed purpose, the real object of the legislation, was to put oleomargarine out of business in the interest of the dairymen of the country; and while there is this question that is identical between that proposition and this—namely, that the tax was not levied in that case, as it is not levied in this case, for the real purpose of raising revenue—the courts did decide that they could not go behind the certificates of the presiding officers and into the purposes and reasons which induced Congress to enact particular legislation, and therefore could not hold the tax invalid, under the broad taxing powers of the Government. But it does seem to me, Mr. President, that when we not only exercise the taxing powers of the Government, not for the purpose of raising revenue at all but for the express purpose of doing indirectly something that the highest court in the land has decided with respect to this very matter and with respect to this identical language that we can not do directly in the form of a bill, it can not be expected that the decision of the court will be very different when this question is presented there for settlement again, as it probably will be if we take this action.

When addressing a body of this kind, containing so many eminent lawyers, I would feel that I was trespassing unduly on the patience of the body if I undertook to read these decisions in line and word and go into an extensive argument. I think we know that we are undertaking in this bill and by this action to do precisely what we tried to do three or four years ago and what the courts of the country, the Supreme Court of the United States, decided we had not the slightest power or right to do. We are not expecting to raise any revenue from this proposition. We are not expecting to do anything except to assert the Federal power by this indirect and unjustifiable method over a matter and over domestic concerns to which it does not and can not relate. That is the situation.

There has been a great deal said about the moral sentiment that is back of this.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I do not know whether the Senator is about to get away from it, but before he gets to the moral question, was the Senator in Congress at the time the phosphorus-match legislation was enacted?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; the Senator from Georgia was then a Member of the House.

Mr. KENYON. Did not the Senator vote at that time in the House that the power might extend?

Mr. HARDWICK. No, sir; I opposed it and voted against it. My recollection is that I opposed it on the ground that Congress did not have power in that case; but, as the Senator very well knows, the principle is very different about that matter from what it is here.

Mr. KENYON. It was stated at that time, was it not, that the purpose of it was entirely moral, to get rid of a dangerous situation and not for the purpose of revenue?

Mr. HARDWICK. The difference between that matter and this, if the Senator will permit me, is that there was something that might be inherently dangerous in the character of the article transported and we might regulate it. I think the courts finally put it on the ground of interstate commerce, because if there is anything inherently dangerous or inherently wrong in the article transported per se then the power of Congress attaches. But here there is no such principle——

Mr. KENYON. Take the oleomargarine cases. There was nothing inherently dangerous in the coloring of oleomargarine. Does not the Senator admit that Congress has power to tax these matters out of existence, provided it does not strike down some fundamental right protected under the Constitution?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I do not admit that. That is the very thing I am saying. I have not the slightest doubt about the power in the oleomargarine case nor in these other cases, because in each one of those instances which the Senator has in mind the taxing power of the Constitution did not come in conflict with other equally potent and other equally valid provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, the Supreme Court said in the oleomargarine cases that the taxing power probably could not be used to strike down some fundamental right.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words——

Mr. KENYON. But the right to produce certain articles with child labor is not any fundamental right.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; but it is the right of a State in this Union to regulate its own domestic and internal concerns, and our people more than any others cling to this right, and you strike at the fundamental right of every local community of this Republic when you undertake to do it.

Mr. LENROOT. Is there not this distinction: Is not the fundamental right that is spoken of in the oleomargarine case the fundamental right of a taxpayer to do business irrespective of the permission of the State? In other words, in the oleomargarine case the court held that the Congress had the right to prohibit that thing which was properly within the taxing power of Congress because it did not interfere with the fundamental rights which were given the State.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; the proposition is this. I think I can state it so that no lawyer will dispute it. First, the taxing power of the Congress is plenary and complete and will not be questioned on any ordinary ground or for any ordinary reason. Yet that is only one of the constitutional powers. It is only one of the Federal powers, and you can not exercise that power in such a way as to utterly destroy and entirely abrogate other provisions of the Constitution of the United States. No court has ever held that Congress could do that. That is what I am saying in this case, that the trouble about this proposition as a matter of law is that in the exercise of the taxing power you undertake to utterly negative and utterly deny and utterly destroy other equally valid powers under the Constitution. The proof of that is that in respect to this very matter the courts have held that we have no right whatever to regulate it.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the Senator what is the fundamental right that he thinks will be destroyed by the exercise of this power?

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought I had just stated it.

Mr. LENROOT. I did not hear all the Senator's remarks.

Mr. HARDWICK. I said the fundamental right involved under our form of government is that each State in this Republic has the right and the power, absolute and exclusive, to control for itself and according to its own will the conditions and terms of child employment or man employment or woman employment or any other and all other domestic and internal affairs and concerns within that State.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the Senator whether he can produce any authority which holds that that kind of a right is a limitation upon the Federal taxing power?

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will read the child-labor decision——

Mr. LENROOT. No; in this case.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am afraid I never will be able to agree with the Senator in that case. We undertook there under the commerce clause to say that these articles should not be transported through interstate commerce at all or enter into interstate commerce unless the people engaged in labor in the several States of the Union were required to conform to certain standards of conduct which we fixed. The Supreme Court of the United States said, strange as it may seem in this day and time, that one of the fundamental rights in this country still left was the right of each State in this Republic to regulate its own domestic and internal concerns, to decide what hours of employment and what conditions of labor should control within the limits of the State.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator allow me again?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. It was not the fundamental right of the State or the fundamental right of the taxpayer, because there was nothing in the child-labor decision to the effect that it is a pure and fundamental right of the individual to employ child labor.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; I see what the Senator means. There is no trouble about that. I am making the complaint that this legislation is in violation of the fundamental right of the individual citizen or taxpayer, and I say it is utterly invalid and can not be supported, because it undertakes to do something in this indirect way that we have no right to do, because it is against the fundamental right of the States and the fundamental right of local communities of the State.

Now, I am going to ask permission before I conclude to have the text of these decisions incorporated in my remarks. I shall quote from them when I do extend my remarks. I am sorry this is brought up at a period when I have not the decisions at hand. I am going to put in the opinion in the oleomargarine case and, I think, in the State bank case.

But there is no need of continuing the legal argument on the amendment. I think we all know what the decision was. We fought it out here through weary weeks and months, and it was decided fairly on its merits.

Mr. KENYON. The decision was four to five.

Mr. HARDWICK. That may be true, yet that same statement could be made about almost every important decision that has been made recently by the Supreme Court of the United States. They nearly always divide on these great questions, but the decision of the court is the controlling thing and it ought to be controlling with us.

The proposition I come to next is this: We have heard a great deal in the debates on this question, protracted during a great many years here and throughout the country, about the moral side of it, the moral sentiment that is back of it. We have had a great deal of such talk, some of it, I reckon, perfectly honest, perfectly sincere; most of it, it may be. Some of it, in my opinion, is more or less selfish and inspired by motives that would not bear too careful a test, but the effect of that argument and that sort of talk about the moral sentiment fails. I want to appeal to Senators on both sides of this Chamber, because it is no partisan question at all about the morals of undertaking to do in this way what the highest court in our country has decided we have no power to do at all. What about the right of an individual Senator to vote in this bill the exact language of an outlawed proposition under the guise and pretext of raising revenue for the Government? No Senator can for one moment contend, or for one second believe, that that is the purpose of it or the intent of it, or the reason for it is to raise revenue for the Government.

There is a good deal of morals involved in this. If we are bound by the decisions of our courts on questions of constitutional law and if the courts have decided solemnly and formally that we have no right in this forum to regulate as a national question the employment of child labor in the several States of this Union, then what Senators can say or ought to say is that we can accomplish precisely the same purpose by levying a tax upon it so heavy as to do indirectly what we can not do directly.

Now, that is the question. It is a naked one, and I present it here nakedly. We can do it if we want to do it, I reckon. I do not think the court will sustain it if we do it; but, of course, each Senator will be his own judge in that matter and cast his own vote according to his own judgment.

But, Mr. President, it does seem to me that each Senator ought to have some hesitancy, some doubt, no matter what his position was on the question originally, about undertaking to do in this indirect manner exactly and precisely what has been decided on this identical issue to be beyond the power of Congress to do,

When we were sworn in each of us swore to support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic. Are we to violate our oath in a technical manner? Are we to stand here and vote for legislation that we know has been decided to be beyond the authority and power of Congress simply because we believe that the courts will say that this being a taxing question it is not within the power of anyone to raise that question in the court? I do not think we ought to do it. For one, I can not do it, and for one, I have no doubt if we do it the Supreme Court of the United States will again decide that it is unconstitutional and invalid, otherwise the taxing power may become the Frankenstein which will utterly destroy all other constitutional powers and limitations, and will finally change both the form and substance of the government, after devouring the Constitution itself.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I did not hear all the Senator's argument, but I wish to ask him in view of the distinction that he attempts to make between the oleomargarine case and this case, what distinction he makes in the bank-tax case?

Mr. HARDWICK. Between that and the oleomargarine case?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is no difference.

Mr. LENROOT. The difference is that in the oleomargarine case, as I understand it, each State has the full right to regulate. In the case of oleomargarine we might have prohibited the transportation of interstate commerce through a regulation of commerce, and therefore the tax could be sustained. Am I correct as to his contention?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. They held in the oleomargarine case, as I recall the decision—I have not read it very recently—that, although the real purpose of the bill might not be to raise revenue, the court could not inquire as to that, and would sustain the tax.

Mr. LENROOT. How does the Senator distinguish between the decision in the State bank case and this?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is easy enough. In the case the Senator refers to the real purpose of the tax might have been to unify the system of Federal banking under the Constitution of the United States, and it would not have been violative of any State provision.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator will recollect that the opinion in that case puts the two propositions upon distinct and independent grounds. It placed the constitutionality of the tax solely upon the taxing power of Congress, irrespective of any consideration the Senator now presents.

Mr. HARDWICK. While that is true, neither in the bank case nor in the oleomargarine case was there this necessary conflict over the power of the State to make its local regulations effective upon all its citizens concerning its own domestic and internal concerns alone involved, according to my understanding of those two decisions.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate more than a few moments on the amendment now pending, but as I happened to be one who moved in the committee the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], I think I ought to say something in regard to it and my reasons for so doing. I have been very deeply interested in the question of child labor for a great many years. I introduced the first bill here for the protection of child labor in the District of Columbia, and I have always sought for legislation on that subject.

I am not going to argue the details. It is a great evil. The States have had ample and abundant opportunity to deal with it themselves. Most of the States have; some have not. I think it is something that ought to be ended.

Congress passed the bill for that purpose by a large majority. That form of legislation has been held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, and therefore it would seem to me that our only resort is to the taxing power. I am no fonder of resorting to that power for this purpose than anyone else, but the Government of the United States has resorted to it in more than one case. In the lottery cases it was not a taxing power, but exclusion from the mails, but the court dwelt on the justification of the action of Congress very largely on account of the ethical question involved, that the lottery was against public policy. We used it in the oleomargarine cases. We used it in the bank cases, which I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. KELLOG] will show better and more fully than I can to the Senate.

It so happened that some years ago I carried through a bill, which became a law, to exterminate by the use of the taxing power the manufacture of white phosphorus matches, which produced hideous diseases among the workers. The bill failed in one Congress and passed in the next. I think the constitutionality of that law has never been questioned.

The amount of revenue to be raised by this measure may be little or nothing. The main purpose is to put a stop to what seems to be a very great evil, and one that ought to be in some way put a stop to. If we are unable to reach it constitutionally in any other way, then I am willing to reach it by the taxing power, which the courts have held can be used constitutionally for such a purpose. I see no other way to do it.

It seems to me that we are justified in using the taxing power for that purpose. It is a constitutional, but extreme method, I readily admit. I think we are justified in it by the fact that the police power of the States has failed to regulate it as it should be regulated.

It was for these reasons, Mr. President, that I moved the insertion of this amendment, which was adopted by the committee by a large majority.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; but I am about through.

Mr. HARDWICK. I shall not keep the Senator very long; I have been very much interested in the Senator's statement. I was wondering where his doctrine would lead. If the Senator feels that the police power of any one or more States was not exercised in a way to conform to the Senator's judgment, if it were possible to do so, the Senator would not hesitate to constitute the Congress as a final judge of the matter, whether they had been properly exercising it or not and would use the taxing power to carry out his own ideas?

Mr. LODGE. It is not a question of my own ideas.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am asking the question in all sincerity. Would not that sort of doctrine utterly destroy the right of the local community to regulate its domestic concerns?

Mr. LODGE. I say we ought to do it as little as possible.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is a very dangerous doctrine.

Mr. LODGE. I admit that it is a dangerous power to use, but I thing cases have arisen where it is less dangerous to use the power than to neglect the evil. I think there is very much better and stronger ground for this legislation than there was for the oleomargarine legislation. It is the fault of the States themselves. I am as much opposed as anyone to the absorption of State powers by the Federal Government. The fact that that is proceeding as I think in very many cases to a very unfortunate limit is owing to the fact that the States have failed to exercise their powers. There has been, more than that, a disposition in the States to throw all sorts of things on the Federal Government, to turn to the Federal Government instead of attending to it themselves. I wish the States would be more alive to their own rights and duties under the Constitution than they have proved themselves to be. But when they leave us after years with a very great evil like this, as I believe it to be, in existence I think there is no choice left for Congress unless it is ready, as I said, to neglect it and allow it to exist without touching it, except to deal with it in that way.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Is it not a fact that the conditions which have brought about this proposed legislation were the conditions existing or supposed to exist in the great manufacturing States, and is it not a fact that in the last few years practically every manufacturing State in the Union where child labor has been more or less employed has had progressive legislation on its own initiative on this very question looking toward the very end that this legislation is looking to? Take South Carolina, for instance. Compare the child-labor law of South Carolina with the pending measure. Yet the State was maligned and misrepresented by some of the individuals who, I suppose, were hunting employment and wanted to create some kind of a sensation in order to show themselves great philanthropists and uplifters. In my State that law is enforced, and it is infinitely better than this. Yet I suppose my State was one of those that was pointed out as being one of the great sinners against pure, innocent childhood.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have not examined the very recent laws of the State, but if the State has made adequate laws of course it will be in no wise affected by this legislation; it will interfere in no way with their industries or their economic policies; but if the evil does exist anywhere then this law will, in my judgment, be highly beneficial.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I want to say just a few words in extension of what I have said. I have been amazed here on the floor of the Senate to see men, when questions come up in which is involved the right of the State under our dual form of government, lend themselves to what they know is absolutely destructive of our present system of government and contributing just as rapidly as possible toward a centralized form of government that means a disruption of our present system.

The question of woman suffrage has been discussed here and it has been defended on the ground that it is the bedrock upon which our conception of democracy rests. The right of self-determination and the right of local self-government rest fundamentally upon the proper exercise of the franchise by the political unit that is concerned, because it goes without saying that the very moment you modify the right to exercise sovereign power you cease to be sovereign.

This is one of the rights granted or reserved to the States. The Supreme Court has said it is unconstitutional. Some of those who have opposed woman suffrage on the ground that it is violative of the principles of our Government come here and, in the face of the decision of the Supreme Court hardly dry on the books, seek by a subterfuge unworthy of a Senator and of a great legislative body to bring about the very thing that the supreme judicial power of this country has said is violative of the principle that we stood at that desk and swore to uphold.

The Senator from Massachusetts said it would not affect my State. I would be unworthy of standing on the floor of the Senate if I only advocated those things that would help South Carolina and opposed things that would not. I am glad that South Carolina will not be affected by it, for then I will not be charged with opposing it, because my State might suffer if it becomes a law. I am opposing it because I do not believe we have any right either in morals or in law to violate the very fundamental principle of the Constitution. The logic of events is centralizing fast enough without lending ourselves to the centralizing force.

I for one will vote against it not because I am not as much in favor of protecting children and granting them the full enjoyment as far as may be of the kingdom of childhood, but I am voting against it because I believe each and every State is better qualified to determine under what conditions the children under their jurisdiction shall live than the Congress of the United States.

South Carolina is better able to know the condition of her children than the State of Washington knows of South Carolina, and I warn the Senate now that these encroachments and these raids on our form of government are coming thick and fast, and we will wake up after a while to find that the splendid system of government that makes our liberty possible has passed away and we are a great centralized socialistic body without the power of self-determination in any local form whatever.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] very frankly admits that the purpose of this provision is to nullify a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. This bill is entitled "A bill to raise revenue"; that is stated as its purpose. I want to ask my colleague if this provision was inserted for the purpose of raising revenue? Was it the desire of the committee to raise revenue when they incorporated this provision in the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can only say to the Senator that I do not think there was any estimate made as to the amount of revenue that would be raised by it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts was very frank in his statement. He said it was inserted to nullify the action of the Supreme Court.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not say that.

Mr. OVERMAN. In effect the Senator said that. If the Senator please, he said that the Supreme Court had declared the child-labor law unconstitutional——

Mr. LODGE. I have not questioned that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Just a moment—and that this provision will be inserted in the bill, and the taxing power is to be used to nullify an opinion of the Supreme Court, in which it stated that the act was unconstitutional.

Mr. LODGE. It was to reach the same object in a constitutional way.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator if the effect would not be to nullify that opinion?

Mr. LODGE. It would nullify the practical effect of the decision, but not its legal validity.

Mr. OVERMAN. It would nullify it so far as its practical effect as a law is concerned, and there is no estimate as to this provision for raising revenue.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can only make the statement to my colleague that there was no estimate presented to the committee as to the amount of revenue which would be derived from it; and I do not think anyone suggested that any would be derived.

Mr. OVERMAN. Did the committee expect that any revenue would be raised by it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know what the members of the committee expected, but I have heard no one suggest that any revenue would be raised by it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Frankly, does my colleague think that any revenue will be raised by it?

Mr. SIMMONS. My individual judgment is that no revenue will be raised by it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, we have before us a taxing bill here for the purpose of raising revenue, and we have the chairman of the Committee on Finance frankly admitting that this provision was put into the bill for the purpose of raising revenue when no revenue is expected and no revenue was estimated to come from it. We have the learned Senator from Massachusetts, in effect, saying that the provision is put in here for the purpose of nullifying the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. President, in reference to the oleomargarine case and the Veazie case, I ask upon what grounds did the court decide that the questions therein decided were constitutional, when it was admitted here in the Senate during its consideration that the provision inserted was not for the purpose of raising revenue? The Supreme Court said they could not go behind what the bill purported or was in the mind of Congress; but they went on and said that the question of constitutionality ought to be left with the conscience of each Senator.

There are three grand divisions of this Government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. When the judiciary, the Supreme Court of the United States, says that a law which we have passed through Congress providing for the same thing as this provision is unconstitutional, and members of the committee say that this provision is put into the pending bill for the purpose of avoiding that decision, I say that morally it is wrong, and, in my judgment, the Supreme Court will declare it to be unconstitutional.

In the oleomargarine case (195 U. S., 55) the court says in reference to this matter of the division of this Government into three departments, that each branch of the Government ought to receive from the other branches due consideration. The opinion states:

> It is believed to be one of the chief merits of the American system of written constitutional law that all the powers intrusted to the Government, whether State or National, are divided into the three grand departments—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial; that the functions appropriate to each of these branches of Government shall be vested in a separate body of public servants, and that the perfection of the system requires that the lines which separate and divide these departments shall be broadly and clearly defined. It is also essential to the successful working of this system that the persons intrusted with power in any one of these branches shall not be permitted to encroach upon the powers confided to others, but that each shall by the law of its creation be limited to the exercise of the powers appropriate to its own department and no other.

Mr. President, I have read this extract from the oleomargarine case itself, this statement that we, as Senators, ought not to encroach upon the judiciary or upon any other department of the Government. It is wrong in morals if we do so; and yet this is done, according to the Senator's admission here and the statement by the committee itself, for the purpose not only of encroaching upon the rights of the Supreme Court but in order to nullify its decision. The power to tax is the power to destroy; and when the Senate of the United States goes out of its way to interfere with another great branch of this Government, and it appears in the RECORD—and I suppose the Supreme Court will read this RECORD—that it is done for that purpose, that court is not going to uphold this section.

It was a taxing power which was discussed in the oleomargarine law; but it, too, was a revenue bill, and the court would not go behind the law, because they took it for granted that Members of Congress passed the law for the purpose of raising revenue, and they could not go behind that. But here is an admission that this is not done for the purpose of raising revenue; that it will not raise revenue; but that it is for the purpose of destroying the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator does not claim that there are not any number of precedents where Congress has passed laws imposing a tax where there was no expectation that such laws would yield revenue?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have just stated that Congress has passed such laws.

Mr. KELLOGG. Congress passed a 10 per cent tax on the issues of State banks.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have just stated that Congress had passed such laws, the constitutionality of one of which was involved in the Veazie case and another in the oleomargarine case; but I gave the reason why they declared those acts constitutional.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from North Carolina would not claim that, if oleomargarine is a legitimate subject of commerce, the Federal Government could prohibit its manufacture in the States? The Senator does not claim that?

Mr. OVERMAN. No.

Mr. KELLOGG. But Congress can levy a tax upon it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Congress can levy a tax against it and destroy it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well.

Mr. OVERMAN. Congress can levy a tax and destroy it if it wants to do so, but Congress can not go out of its way to nullify a decision of the Supreme Court when it is clear that such is the purpose of the law itself. Does the Senator from Minnesota think it can do so? Does he think that this Congress, upon the ground of morals alone, can take advantage of a taxing law to nullify a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think Congress is the judge of whether the taxing power should be imposed or not. If the effect is to nullify a decision of the Supreme Court, and it is legal, Congress is the one to judge of that, of course.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the object of a revenue bill? It is to raise revenue. Now, I ask the Senator if the object is not to raise revenue but to destroy the decision of the Supreme Court in morals, is that correct?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think it is perfectly correct; it is as correct as it was in the case of the State banks. In that case it was done to prevent the States from issuing money and not for the purpose of raising revenue.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no decision of the Supreme Court involved in that case. I put the case to the Senator, If the purpose of this provision is to nullify a decision of the Supreme Court, a coordinate branch of this Government, and not to raise revenue, in morals is that the right thing to do?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have yielded to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. Later I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I think the decision of the Supreme Court is placed upon the ground that Congress had no power to prohibit a State from manufacturing a certain article purely in intrastate commerce, but that the same object could be obtained by levying a tax—which is clearly within the constitutional power of Congress—and that there is nothing immoral about doing it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Minnesota has not answered my question. I asked him if it were right in morals for Congress, a coordinate branch of the Government, to include in a taxing law a provision to nullify a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States when that was done for the purpose of nullifying such a decision and not for the purpose of raising revenue?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think I answered the Senator's question. I say that I think if the tax imposed is within the constitutional powers of government it is for Congress to decide and not for the courts.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; it is for the Senator from Minnesota and for me to determine now whether it is right in law or not. The Supreme Court of the United States says in its opinion that we are the judges of it. I admit that under the oleomargarine case or the Veazie case, this being a bill to raise revenue, and nothing else, that, as the Supreme Court says, we can levy a tax which will destroy; no matter what it does, they can not go behind what Congress has done to ascertain the purpose of it; but here is an admission upon the floor of the Senate that the committee inserted this provision for the purpose of nullifying the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina now admits that we have the taxing power to deal with this subject—the taxing power to raise revenue. That being admitted, the Senator has admitted his entire case away, for the courts will not inquire into the motives which may have prompted Congress in passing a bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, that is just what I said was the decision in the oleomargarine case; but I further stated that where the motive is admitted——

Mr. POMERENE. No; but, Mr. President, there is not any Senator here who can admit a motive by Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, everybody knows that what I stated is true, and we might as well be candid with each other. I will ask the Senator this question: If the Supreme Court knew that this legislation was passed with the intention of nullifying their decision, if that were admitted as the motive, would that act stand for a minute?

Mr. POMERENE. Looking at this from the standpoint of the constitutionality of the provision, it may be admitted that one of its purposes is the raising of revenue.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that true?

Mr. POMERENE. It is true.

Mr. OVERMAN. To raise revenue?

Mr. POMERENE. It is true. We are dealing with the other proposition as well, and we——

Mr. OVERMAN. Did the Senator introduce his bill on this subject for the purpose of raising revenue?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to state this in my own way, I will say that we have sought to deal with this question in various ways. In a bill which was passed some time ago we invoked the power of Congress over interstate commerce. The Supreme Court by a divided tribunal, five to four, held that that was unconstitutional. The friends of the measure sought to adopt some other plan by which we could deal with the question. In the pending bill we are raising revenue, and we saw fit to draft this provision for the purpose of raising revenue and at the same time to meet the child-labor problem. Now, we are not shying away from that question at all; but if we can find the power to deal with this question under the taxing power it makes no difference to the Supreme Court what other purpose may have been in the minds of the draftsmen of the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will not say that he introduced his bill for the purpose of raising revenue?

Mr. POMERENE. I have just said to the Senator—and I can not make it any stronger—that there was a twofold purpose, and we saw fit to use the taxing power to meet this situation because we believed it could be done.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator believe, if this provision were constitutional and it should be upheld, that it will raise any revenue?

Mr. POMERENE. I do; and if it does not, then you have nothing to complain of, because——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, along the line I suggested as to the morals of this procedure, I should like to read what the great——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is a matter that I did not state with as much clearness as I wished in my previous remarks. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he believes that in the exercise of the taxing power of the Government, which is only one of the powers conferred on Congress, we can violate other cognate provisions of the Constitution?

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President; and the Supreme Court in one case has held that that can not be done.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the real question here. We can not take the taxing power of the Federal Government, in my opinion, and so exercise it as to utterly disregard and trample upon other provisions that are entirely valid.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me to ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. What is the view of the Senator from Georgia as to the limitation of the Constitution on the taxing power of Congress?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the taxing power, Mr. President, can not be exercised in any way so as to repeal or affect or nullify other provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. KENYON. That is, to destroy fundamental rights?

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly—the fundamental rights of the States.

Mr. KENYON. That is the ultimate question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, that is it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have said that this provision in the bill is not for the purpose of raising revenue, but it is, and we might as well be candid, to nullify a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Whenever that is admitted, Mr. President, then everybody must admit that it is a very dangerous power, because if we can do this in one case we can do it in a million cases.

Judge Tucker, quoting from Cooley, says—I am reading from Tucker on the Constitution, Volume I, pages 501 and 502:

Constitutionally a tax can have no other basis than the raising of revenue for public purposes, and whatever governmental exaction has not this basis is tyrannical and unlawful.

This is the language of Judge Cooley:

A tax on imports, therefore, the purpose of which is not to raise revenue, but to discourage and indirectly prohibit some particular import for the benefit of some home manufacture may well be questioned as being merely colorable, and therefore not warranted by constitutional principles.

He (Judge Cooley) says that, as it is a duty from which revenue may be derived, the judicial power, where the motive of laying does not appear on the face of the act—

Just what we contend and what the court said in the oleomargarine case—can not condemn it as being unconstitutional, but it is none the less a violation of the Constitution by the legislator who knows its object and levies the duty from a motive not justified by the Constitution.

In other words, this provision appears upon its face to be for the purpose of raising revenue, but when a Senator, knowing that it is done for another purpose and not for the purpose of raising revenue, votes for it, he is violating his oath.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As there will be no tax laid if children are not worked in the factories——

Mr. OVERMAN. That is right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And as the purpose of the law is to prevent children from being worked in the factories, the purpose of the law is not to raise any revenue.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have just said that; and it is practically admitted. Therefore, according to our textbooks and to the Supreme Court of the United States, whenever a Senator votes for that sort of a provision of law which is not for the purpose of raising revenue he is violating his oath as a Senator, because the Supreme Court, when it looks at the act to determine as to its constitutionality and sees from the title of the bill that it is "for the purpose of raising revenue, and for other purposes," according to the decision in the oleomargarine case, it will not go behind that; and yet the announcement is made that this provision is not expected to raise any revenue. This is a great coordinate branch of the Government; it ought to respect the Supreme Court of the United States and have due respect for its decisions, and each Member of it ought to respect the oath he has taken to stand by the Constitution. Of course, Mr. President, my remarks do not apply to any Senator who thinks that this provision will raise revenue or who thinks it has been put in the bill for the purpose of raising revenue; but I assume, from the admissions made here by members of the committee, that it is not for that purpose. I quote further from Judge Tucker's great book on the Constitution, as follows:

It may be added that when the protection of private enterprise is not through the agency of protective duties but assumes the bolder form of taxation to put money into the Treasury for appropriation to the payment of bounties for private enterprise, the features of unconstitutionality of which Judge Miller speaks are obvious on the very face of the law; and that such appropriation for private enterprise of public money obtained by public taxation is "none the less robbery because it is done under the forms of law, and is called appropriation."

That is in reference to another case, but citing the same principle that the Supreme Court can not go behind the bill itself which Congress says it has passed for a certain purpose. It is left to each Member of Congress in his conscience.

The Supreme Court has decided in United States v. Dewitt that an act of Congress making it criminal for a citizen to mix for sale, etc., certain explosives was unconstitutional. Chief Justice Chase said: "The questions certified resolve themselves into this: Has Congress power under the Constitution to prohibit trade within the limits of a State? * * * Standing by itself, it is plainly a regulation of police." He adds: "As a police regulation, relating exclusively to the internal trade of the States, it can only have effect where the legislative authority of Congress excludes territorially all State legislation, as, for example, in the District of Columbia. Within State limits it can have no constitutional operation. This has been so frequently declared by this court, results so obviously from the terms of the Constitution, and has been so fully explained and supported on former occasions that we think it unnecessary to enter again upon the discussion."

The question then confronts us, If Congress can not by direct action constitutionally put down and prevent the sale of an article in a State, can it by the indirection of the taxing power seek to destroy what the Constitution prohibits it to touch?

I read the conclusion:

In other words, it can not pervert the use of a power given for one purpose into an instrument for accomplishing another purpose which is expressly denied to it. It can not do by indirection what under the Constitution it has no power to do by direct means.

Without discussing the morals or the merits of the provision, I place myself upon the oleomargarine case itself, in which it is said that it is a matter of conscience for each Senator. Knowing that this amendment is not for the purpose of raising revenue, and knowing that it is for the purpose of nullifying a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and doing by indirection that which Congress can not do by direction, is it right for the Senate to make it a part of a revenue bill?

As I have already stated, this bill is for the purpose of raising revenue to pay the war debts. Will this provision aid in that purpose? It is admitted that it will not. Is there something that stands in the way of this sort of legislation? It is admitted there is. Where? In the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is admitted that it will not raise revenue; it is admitted that we are trying to do something by indirection that we can not do by direction; it is wrong; and I protest against it.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. LENROOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in the first place, before entering into a discussion of the legal proposition which has been raised, I wish to say that, in my judgment, this amendment can be sustained and voted for as a taxing measure without regarding it in any wise as a subterfuge. No one will dispute that Congress in the exercise of its taxing power can say, "We will tax, as an excise tax, all profits of a given business." That must be admitted, because we are not limited in the exercise of our taxing power to the taxing of profits; we may tax capital. Nearly a hundred years ago Chief Justice Marshall coined the phrase with which we are all familiar, "The power to tax is the power to destroy." It is equally legitimate for Congress through the exercise of its taxing power to say to the employer of child labor, "We do not prohibit the employment of child labor, but you shall not profit by coining into money the lives of little children, and any money that you shall so make the Government will take from you."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. I merely wish to develop the Senator's position just a little further. If what he has stated be true, then, can not Congress by the use of the same power in the same manner say to the people of every State in the Union, "We will tax all labor employed over eight hours," and in that way control that question even in an intrastate matter?

Mr. LENROOT. Possibly. There is—and I shall come to it later—one exception other than is found in the constitutional provision itself, and that is the fundamental right that the Senator spoke of in his remarks—not the fundamental right of the State to control a private business, but the fundamental right of the taxpayer himself, guaranteed by a free government.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator say that what I last suggested to him could be done under his view of the taxing power?

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator asks me whether, in my judgment, we might tax through the exercise of the taxing power all of the earnings of labor employed over eight hours.

Mr. HARDWICK. The profits of labor employed more than eight hours throughout the country. Could we tax that under the Senator's view?

Mr. LENROOT. I will frankly answer the Senator's question, and, from the standpoint of the constitutional power of Congress, unhesitatingly say "yes"——

Mr. HARDWICK. Then the Senator thinks the taxing power is so transcendent——

Mr. LENROOT. Let me finish. Granted, as I think we perhaps both would agree, that the State itself would have the right to make an eight-hour limitation in the exercise of its powers.

Mr. HARDWICK. A State may or may not choose to do that.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I would not be prepared to answer the question.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the State makes the limit 10 hours it would not make any difference in the question of power, but if the Senator is correct in his position it must follow that the Congress of the United States has a right to say that it will impose any tax that it chooses upon the product of labor in every State in the Union that may be employed more than eight hours in any one day. That is true, is it not?

Mr. LENROOT. It is true if we grant that the State itself in the regulation of the hours of labor might prohibit more than eight hours work in a day.

Mr. HARDWICK. I say, conceding that question.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, let us go a step further. If that be true, then the Senator's position is that the taxing power of the Federal Government is so transcendent that it repeals every other cognate provision of the Constitution——

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all.

Mr. HARDWICK. No matter what reservations are left to the States and to their people, respectively.

Mr. LENROOT. The taxing power does not repeal any other provisions of the Constitution, but it stands upon its own bottom and is complete in itself, as the Supreme Court has held in a number of cases.

Mr. HARDWICK. The trouble that I see about the Senator's position is that it would give the Federal Government the right absolutely to regulate every vested and internal concern in every State in this Union in spite of the other provisions of the Federal Constitution which deny that right expressly and explicitly.

Mr. LENROOT. Limited only by the suggestion made in the McCray case, to which I shall refer in a moment, and the limitations found in the clause itself, I say that the taxing power of the Federal Government is supreme and unlimited. The limitation to which I have referred—although not necessary to the decision, for it is obiter, but I think we would all concur in it—is that the taxing power can not destroy fundamental inherent rights of an individual, which neither State nor Federal Governments can directly destroy, but it may destroy any rights that a State in the exercise of its police powers might destroy. That is the situation. The States unquestionably have the right in the exercise of their police powers to prohibit the employment of child labor under the ages designated by this provision of the bill. Therefore it clearly is within the proper exercise of the taxing power of Congress by a taxing law to say to the employers of child labor, "We will take all of the profits that you may make out of child labor."

I am frank to say that, of course, that will result in the nonemployment of child labor, because the only reason that child labor is employed throughout this country is the expectation of profit upon the part of the employer by utilizing the services of children of tender age. Take away from the manufacturer the hope of profit, and, of course, there is no further incentive for him to employ child labor and it will cease.

In this connection I wish to quote from the address that President Wilson made at the joint session of Congress on May 27 last, which we all heard, in reference to this very revenue bill which he then proposed. In that address he said:

> The profiteer that can not be got at by the restrictions of conscience and love of country can be got at by taxation.

This is only one of the provisions of the bill that seek to get at profiteers, men who will not through the restraint of conscience or love of country do those things which ought to be done.

But, now, to get back for one moment again to the contention of the Senator from Georgia. If I understand his contention aright, the Federal Government could not tax to the point of destruction, at least, a business of which the State alone had the power of regulation. If that be true, this revenue bill is full of taxes imposed upon business conducted wholly within the States, wholly within the jurisdiction of a State, business over which the Federal Government under the interstate-commerce clause or other clauses of the Constitution has no control. For instance, take the tax upon beverages. It is wholly within the police power of a State to regulate the manufacture of intoxicating liquors or to permit the sale of intoxicating liquors within a State. Will the Senator say that the validity of an act of Congress placing a tax upon beverages, as is done in other provisions of this bill, is to be measured by whether or not the tax destroys the business?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think I can give the Senator an illustration of what the Senator from Georgia, at least, would say on that subject.

Mr. LENROOT. I shall be very glad to have it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Suppose the local laws, the laws of the several States, taking any one of them for illustration—Georgia, say—provided that barrooms should stay open until midnight, 12 o'clock. Does the Senator think that we could regulate that purely local question by levying a tax, not on all whisky sold in States but only on that class of whisky where barrooms were kept open later than 9 o'clock?

Mr. LENROOT. I have no doubt whatever of it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, that is a very fair illustration.

Mr. LENROOT. And, if the Senator will remember, questions of identically that nature have already been passed upon by the Supreme Court in a number of cases where excise taxes and income taxes have been before the Supreme Court, and the contention was made that there was discrimination between different kinds of income or different kinds of property; and in every case the Supreme Court has said that the only uniformity that is required in levying excise taxes is a geographical uniformity, and that it will not inquire into the matter of discrimination between this kind of business and that kind of business.

Mr. President, this entire matter has been before the Supreme Court a great many times; and if a question can ever be considered settled, this question, so far as the matter of constitutionality is concerned, is settled by the Supreme Court.

Reference has been made to the oleomargarine case, the case of McCray against United States, found in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States, page 27. After reviewing a great many of the leading cases upon the subject, the court sums up its conclusion, and I wish very briefly to quote from the opinion.

The court says:

> Since, as pointed out in all the decisions referred to, the taxing power conferred by the Constitution knows no limits except those expressly stated in that instrument, it must follow, if a tax be within the lawful power, the exertion of that power may not be judicially restrained because of the results to arise from its exercise.

The Senator from Georgia and other Senators, especially the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], urge that because this taxing power will change the status of the employment of child labor permitted by the decision of the Supreme Court in the child-labor case, therefore this is a wrongful exercise of the taxing power; but in this case and in many others the courts expressly recognize that through the exercise of the taxing power results may follow quite apart from the direct powers of the Federal Government, but nevertheless in every case the courts have held it to be a proper exercise of the taxing power.

I continue to quote:

> The proposition now relied upon was urged in Knowlton v. Moore (178 U. S., 41) and was overruled. In that case it was insisted that although death duties were within the power to levy excise taxation, as the effect of their extreme enforcement would involve the power to destroy the right to the passage or receipt of property on the occasion of death—a subject within the exclusive control of the States—therefore death duties, when imposed by Congress, must be held to be unconstitutional.

In considering this contention, after referring to the statement of Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland, that the power to tax involves the power to destroy, it was observed:

> This principle is pertinent only when there is no power to tax a particular subject, and has no relation to a case where such right exists. In other words, the power to destroy which may be the consequence of taxation is a reason why the right to tax should be confined to subjects which may be lawfully embraced therein, even although it happens that in some particular instance no great harm may be caused by the exercise of the taxing authority as to a subject which is beyond its scope. But this reasoning has no application to a lawful tax, for if it had there would be an end of all taxation. That is to say, if a lawful tax can be defeated because the power which is manifested by its imposition may when further exercised be destructive, it would follow that every lawful tax would become unlawful, and therefore no taxation whatever could be levied.

It will be observed that in the case of Knowlton against Moore, cited in the quotation that I have read, the constitutionality of a Federal tax levying death duties was raised; and there the disposition of estates—inheritances—was clearly a subject wholly within the power of the States. Under no clause of the Federal Constitution was the Federal Government given any power of control over that subject, save alone through the taxing power. The taxing power was employed. Through the taxing power the right of the State might be absolutely defeated, as was here held. Nevertheless, it was sustained; and so here, notwithstanding the right of your State or my State to regulate the employment of child labor, the right to say that a child of a younger age than that prescribed in the bill might be employed in the State, the law would stand. There is no interference with the right; but the taxing power, supreme, comes along and says that of the proceeds of that kind of a business the Federal Government will take so much. The State has not been interfered with; the individual has been interfered with; and he has no fundamental right beyond the power or control of the taxing power of Congress.

Again, in the same case—and I wish especially to call this to the attention of the Senator from Georgia—the court says:

> The judiciary is without authority to avoid an act of Congress exerting the taxing power, even in a case where to the judicial mind it seems that Congress had, in putting such power in motion, abused its lawful authority by levying a tax which was unwise or oppressive, or the result of the enforcement of which might be to indirectly affect subjects not within the powers delegated to Congress.

I do not know how language could be plainer or how the doctrine could be more clearly stated that under the taxing power of Congress it may indirectly accomplish a result that Congress could not deal with directly, exactly as is the case in the case before us, the employment of child labor.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I suggest to the Senator that the only possible answer to that is found in the very first authority which he cited, which was the oleomargarine case, I think, was it not?

Mr. LENROOT. This is the oleomargarine case.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. The first citation the Senator read was from the opinion in the oleomargarine case.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. In which the Supreme Court said that the power of taxation was limited only by other provisions of the Constitution itself. That was the opening sentence that the Senator read, and that is precisely the contention that is made here.

Mr. LENROOT. But while that may have been a general statement, the Senator can not point to any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, from the beginning to this day, where in a given case the doctrine that he now states has been applied, because from the foundation of this Government to the present day the doctrine has been uniform that the power of taxation is supreme, limited only by the limitations found in the clause itself and limited again only by the exception stated in the McCray case, to which I shall now refer.

The opinion in the McCray case concludes—as I remember this is the concluding paragraph—with this language——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin further yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is an unbroken line of decisions to the exact opposite, I think, of what the Senator has contended, beginning with Marshall's day, in the early days of this Republic, that the Federal Government, even under this omnipotent power of taxation of which the Senator speaks, can not tax State securities and can not tax State salaries, because the power of taxation is limited by other provisions in the Federal Constitution.

Mr. LENROOT. I have not read those decisions recently, but I think I have them clearly in mind, and, as I recollect them, the doctrine of which the Senator now speaks was not placed upon any express limitations in the Constitution itself, but was placed upon the correct doctrine that each State is a sovereignty, and is as truly sovereign within its sphere as the Federal Government is sovereign within its sphere.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, of course; but that doctrine rests on the tenth article of amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. I thought the Senator had in mind some of the specific grants and not the reserved powers.

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. LENROOT. That was, of course, the contention in this leading case, the real gist of the matter in McCulloch against Maryland, but the distinction is very apparent. That involved the case of one sovereignty taxing another sovereignty, as distinguished from the business conducted by an individual within the sovereignty.

Mr. HARDWICK. But, if the Senator pleases, it also involved the proposition that even this omnipotent and universal power of taxation could not be exercised, and the court so held in a case where the Federal Constitution made provision against its exercise.

Mr. LENROOT. There are, as I have stated, and as the Senator will admit, only two limitations, and one of those is found in the clause itself, and this other that I did not think of treating as an exception or limitation, because it involved one sovereignty taxing another sovereignty, and the Supreme Court very properly held that that could not be done, and, of course, there has been a long line of cases sustaining that doctrine. But I challenge the Senator to point to a single case of the taxing of any private individual, or any taxation otherwise than taxation of another sovereignty or the agency of that sovereignty, where a clause of the Constitution other than the limitation found in the clause itself has been invoked and sustained as a limitation upon the taxing power. It can not be done, because it does not exist, and because the decisions are uniform that the power is supreme, and limited only by the limitations found in the clause itself, and this general exception to which I now come.

The court said in the McCray case:

Let us concede that if a case was presented where the abuse of the taxing power was so extreme as to be beyond the principles which we have previously stated, and where it was plain to the judicial mind that the power had been called into play not for revenue but solely for the purpose of destroying rights which could not be rightfully destroyed consistently with the principles of freedom and justice upon which the Constitution rests, that it would be the duty of the courts to say that such an arbitrary act was not merely an abuse of a delegated power, but was the exercise of an authority not conferred. This concession, however, like the one previously made, must be without influence upon the decision of this cause for the reasons previously stated.

And what were the reasons previously stated? The reasons previously stated, taking the oleomargarine case out of this exception, were that the State in the exercise of its police power had the fullest authority to absolutely prohibit the manufacture of colored oleomargarine, because of the tendency to deception and fraud growing out of such manufacture; and therefore there was no inherent, there was no fundamental, right of the citizen to engage in the manufacture of oleomargarine. So this exception could not be invoked in the oleomargarine case, for, Mr. President, in the case of child labor the cases are exactly parallel. No one will contend that the States in the exercise of their police powers can not absolutely prohibit the employment of all child labor under the ages designated in the amendment now pending. The States have so held; the Supreme Court of the United States has affirmed time and time again legislation upon that subject. Therefore, Mr. President, it is not a fundamental and inherent right of the citizen to employ child labor, because the State in the exercise of its police powers may prohibit it; and therefore, in the exercise of this taxing power, by the taxes imposed by this amendment, we are not destroying the fundamental right of an employer of child labor, because no such fundamental right exists.

I shall not occupy further time, Mr. President, except to say that I do not believe that there has ever been a question before Congress where the law has been so clearly and so well settled as it is as applied to the amendment now pending.

Mr. President, I venture to say that the court can not find this amendment invalid without overruling, I will say, a hundred cases from the foundation of the Republic down to the present day—one long, unbroken line of consistent doctrine. The Supreme Court will not do so. The Supreme Court will sustain this amendment if it becomes a part of the law.

I have not gone into any discussion of the question that was merely suggested with reference to whether or not the Supreme Court would inquire into the motives of Congress in passing a taxing measure, because even the opponents of the measure, I understand, admit that the Supreme Court will not so inquire; and, of course, the Supreme Court will not so inquire. It will assume that this is a revenue, a taxing, measure, and, as I have tried to show, it is clearly within the power of Congress. It can be sustained. It can be voted for by Senators not feeling that they are voting for something as a subterfuge to accomplish by indirection what could not be accomplished directly, but it can be voted for upon the theory that by the exercise of the taxing power we will deprive employers of child labor of profit. Depriving them of profit, it will follow that the employment of child labor will cease.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the title of the pending bill is:

An act to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

I imagine, therefore, that it is sufficiently comprehensive to include the pending amendment and practically anything or everything else which might be offered for the consideration of the Senate.

So far, then, as the form or purpose of this amendment is concerned, in view of the absence of limitations upon our power to legislate, I know of no reason why it is not perfectly appropriate in this bill. I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has also demonstrated the uniformity of the provisions of the amendment with the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the Federal power of taxation; and I presume that, following the line of modern decision, the act will be sustained.

There is, however, one fundamental difference between the facts or the history of this proposed legislation and that of analogous tax legislation which has been sustained. I refer, of course, to the fact that the Supreme Court within the last few months has declared a measure under which Congress exercised its jurisdiction over the whole question of child labor to be beyond the powers of the General Government, and, of course, this amendment, following directly upon the heels of that opinion, presents a different situation—whether it is an important one or not remains to be seen—from that of all preceding instances.

I do not think there is any question but that the purpose of this amendment is to prohibit the use of child labor in certain industries in the States of the Union. The matter of revenue is merely an incident, or, if it is a matter of revenue, is merely the basis for the exercise of the power. The purpose to be accomplished is precisely the purpose sought to be accomplished by the measure which was held to be unconstitutional.

Much as I sympathize with the constantly growing sentiment in favor of the prohibition of child labor, I was unable to support the measure which the Supreme Court set aside, and for the reason which the majority opinion declares much better than I was then able, or am now able, to declare. I did not believe, and I do not believe now, that the power of Congress over interstate commerce is sufficiently broad to give it jurisdiction of the police powers of the States, and the recognition of that jurisdiction in one direction necessarily recognizes the right to exercise the power in all other directions whenever Congress in its wisdom shall see fit to do so.

This recent line of decisions of the Supreme Court is a development of the judicial power of the United States. There is no question about that. The case read by the Senator from North Carolina from Ninth Wallace, and cases previous to the date of that one, and possibly some afterwards, recognized very plainly and enforced the proposition that a constitutional limitation, the absence of a constitutional power, could not be overcome by an indirect exercise of that power any more than by the attempt at the direct exercise of it.

The Supreme Court has been keeping pace, however, with the growth of public thought. I have always thought that Mr. Dooley's claim to the first place among the humorists of this time was the inculcation in his very amusing way of a great deal of genuine philosophy. In discussing the insular cases, for example, Hennessy asked him whether he believed that the Supreme Court followed the flag. His reply was that he did not know, but he observed that they followed the elections mighty closely; and that is absolutely true. I do not mention it as at all discreditable, because it is not, but merely as a fact; and the constant growth of those cases toward the recognition of the right of taxation, even to the power of confiscation, has been largely due to the fact that it dawned upon the congressional mind some time ago that through the exercise of that power a great deal could be accomplished which otherwise could not be accomplished at all.

It may be, Mr. President, that if such a power had been invoked earlier in the history of the United States we could have avoided a great deal of unpleasantness and possibly some of the internecine strife which has disfigured the pages of our history. For example, if, in 1860, a special and prohibitive tax had been placed upon the products of slave labor, its abolition might have been accomplished without resorting to arms or an attempt to destroy the Government of the United States. If slavery should rear its head in any of our possessions or in the United States again, we may comfort ourselves with the reflection that we can very easily knock it all to pieces by resorting to a system of taxation.

Mr. President, my objection to this amendment is therefore not a constitutional but a practical one. I think that we have gone as far as we ought to go in using the taxing power of the United States for the purpose of effecting social reforms; and I am afraid that if we go much further it will be perhaps the only medium through which these reforms will be attempted, and some of them may not be ultimately to our liking.

The oleomargarine case, apart from the bank case, was perhaps the first attempt to utilize the taxing power for a purpose other than the raising of revenue. The outcry against oleomargarine came from the dairymen, from those who produced and furnished the country with butter. They saw in the oleomargarine situation a potential source of competition, and those who were interested invoked the taxing power of the United States to put a quietus upon it. The Supreme Court sustained the legislation; and, after sustaining it, more drastic legislation was enacted, which is now in force. Nobody who knows anything about the history of the oleomargarine legislation pretends that its purpose was to raise revenue; and so, Mr. President, with some of the other cases which have been cited.

The present measure, if it goes into effect, will unquestionably result in preventing the employment of children within the prescribed ages in the pursuits which are specified in the bill. It will, in other words, accomplish precisely what was sought unsuccessfully to be accomplished in our legislation of a year or two ago, and the reasons given for the sustaining of the law will be precisely the reasons, perhaps stated in a little different way, which have been presented by the court in sustaining similar legislation. It will add, however, another precedent, and goes further than any of the preceding ones in the direction of utilizing the taxing power for the purpose of effecting social changes and reforms, and it may also be utilized for the purpose of political and industrial punishment under the guise of social reform.

The other day, I think in the city of Cleveland, there was a very serious strike. The employees of the local traction company, objecting to the employment of so many women, went upon a strike because their protest against female employment went unheeded. How the matter was settled I do not pretend to say, but I can easily understand how, in the fierce competition for employment, rivalry and controversy more than State wide may present itself between men workers and women workers; and I can easily understand how, if legislation of this kind is to be passed and sustained, the same power may be resorted to by the successful element at the polls against the vanquished element.

Let us suppose, for example, Mr. President—and I do not think the supposition is a violent one—that within the next 10 years the pressure of female employment upon male employment becomes so exciting and so drastic as to present a political issue to the voters of the country. In the meantime, woman suffrage has become an established fact. The States, whatever their legislation may be upon the subject in the meanwhile, will not present a uniform condition. That can be acquired only by national legislation.

The side winning the election then comes to Congress for relief, and presents a bill, we will say, like this, if the men win, as they sometimes do, that every person operating any business situated in the United States where women have been employed or permitted to work during any portion of the taxable year shall be taxed, we will say, 25 per cent of the proceeds of the business. Of course, it is an attempt to apply the taxing power of the Constitution to the accomplishment of a greatly desired industrial condition which has been made an issue at the previous election. Or suppose the controversy becomes acute between organized and unorganized labor, and that unorganized labor, which was the more numerous, should succeed at the polls, and attempt, as it doubtless would, if that sort of legislation is to become generally recognized, to prohibit the employment of union labor anywhere in the United States by invoking against it the constitutional power of taxation. Then a bill is to be presented that every person operating business where organized labor has been employed or permitted to work, and so forth, should be taxed 25 per cent or 50 per cent or any other amount which may be necessary to make the real purpose of the bill effective.

Suppose an anti-Semitic agitation in the United States or an anti-German industrial agitation in the United States within the immediate future, how easy it would be to exclude such persons, all such persons, from the possibility of earning a living in this free land of ours by so penalizing the employees through the exercise of the taxing power as to make it impossible for them to exercise their right.

Mr. President, I foresee a great many very serious differences of an industrial and economic character which will certainly be evolved from this war, and upon the return of our millions of soldiers and upon their reabsorption into the industrial and economic life of this country another pressure upon Congress with the probable difficulty of securing employment. I greatly fear if we utilize this power and do it unduly and improperly, not consciously so, perhaps, but nevertheless improperly, we are creating precedents which may arise to disturb us very seriously in the immediate future.

So believing, Mr. President, I hesitate, as I did in the committee, to cast my vote for this or any similar amendment, not because it is a part of the revenue law, but because I do not believe in the safety or expediency of such legislation at this time.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am not going to take the time of the Senate to discuss the constitutionality of this proposed law. It seems to be conceded that Congress has the power to levy a tax, and I believe there can be no question about that. But it is urged that because the law is passed to evade the effect of a decision of the Supreme Court in the child-labor case it is improper to pass a tax bill, some claiming, I believe, that it will be unconstitutional to evade the decision, and others, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], saying that it rests upon the conscience of a Senator himself.

I do not see how it can be unconstitutional if Congress has the power to levy the tax simply because it is an evasion of a decision of the Supreme Court, if it may be called so. Congress clearly would not have the power to prohibit the manufacture of any legitimate article of commerce purely within the State for intrastate consumption. Yet clearly Congress may place a tax on a product or the profit arising from the manufacture to the extent that would take away all incentive to manufacture.

As I said before, from the beginning of the Government to the present time we have the precedent of Congress levying a tax for the purpose of prohibiting the exercise of certain functions by private individuals and by corporations, notably the tax on State banks and the oleomargarine cases. Of course, the court was passing upon the question under another provision of the Constitution, upon an absolute prohibition by Congress, such as the prohibition against the manufacture, we will say, of certain articles, but when Congress comes to pass a tax because the tax would render unprofitable the employment of child labor and was therefore, as they say, an invasion of the decision of the Supreme Court, the court is not going to inquire into the motives of Senators in voting for or against the measure. It rests on the conscience of every Senator whether he believes that this proposed law is a legitimate exercise of legislative power, and whether it will accomplish the object he has in mind. I for one believe I would not have a great deal of difficulty in satisfying my conscience on that score.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss the merits of child-labor laws which have been adopted in the interest of humanity in many States. Every Senator knows that the future of the race, the future of this great people, depends upon the purity and strength of the child and his bringing up. I believe that Congress and the States should throw around the child every protection they can to insure a strong and vigorous manhood. I do not consider this to be an invasion of the Constitution.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, we have heard a great deal of complaint by certain Senators concerning this amendment, because they believe it to be unconstitutional, and they say to vote for it would be to violate their oath of office. Those who entertain that opinion of course should vote against it. Their conscience should guide their vote. I do not share that opinion, and my conscience will be perfectly easy in voting for this amendment. If I thought it was even probably unconstitutional I should not vote for it, but when I contemplate the power of Congress over the subject of taxation I have very little difficulty in finding the authority for such legislation as this.

"The Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," the Constitution says. There is only one limitation upon that power in the Constitution, and that is that Congress shall not levy a tax upon exports, and there are only two qualifications upon it in addition to that limitation. The first is that all direct taxes shall be apportioned among the States according to the census. The second is that all excise taxes shall be uniform in their operation. And as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said, the Supreme Court, time and time again, has held that it is a geographical uniformity to which the Constitution refers.

With only these limitations we have here a plenary power to tax, and I submit that the Senate needs nothing more to convince itself of that fact than a study of the pending measure. It is true, it is sometimes said that to place a tax of the character involved in this amendment is making an unjustifiable classification, but I know of nothing in the adjudicated cases that would uphold that contention.
